We'll begin with a hot hors d'oeuvre, which is always nice, winter or summer. But most of them demand last-minute watching in the broiler, and this time we'll escape that chore. A concoction of clam and cheese can be brought to the living room in a small chafing dish or little casserole set over a heating

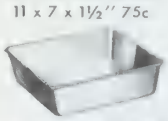
● Much more often than you'd imagine, cake failures may be due to the pans they're baked in, rather than to the recipes they're baked by. Most recipes and ready-mixes are prepared for certain sizes of pans. If you have had to use too-large pans . . . or too-small pans . . . the results aren't apt to be as picture-pretty, or as good to eat, as you had hoped.

New MIRRO Standard Size Pans have the correct, standard sizes, just right for home recipes or prepared mixes, clearly stamped on their bottoms, to help you avoid making this common baking mistake.

The Right Finish Is Important, Too!

Another frequent cause of baking disappointment is the use of utensils that aren't properly finished for the purpose. In baking cakes, for instance, you're wise to select shiny, bright-surfaced aluminum, like the MIRRO Standard Size Cake Pans. These pans s-p-r-e-a-d the heat evenly, for uniform baking. For breads and pies . . . things that want crisp or flaky crusts . . . the MIRRO Alumilite finish that has a dull, heat-absorbent surface, is ideal.



So, next time things don't go just right, don't be too quick to blame your skill, your recipe, or your ready-mix. Instead, measure the size of the pan you're using and notice whether its finish is shiny or dull. You might find that old pans are the cause of it all.

unit, and served there on rounds of Melba toast or squares of pumpernickel. The mixture will be thick enough not to run and it will remain hot until everyone has had his fill—all the advantages of a hot hors d'oeuvre without the fuss and bother.

The meat will be lamb rouladen. It is made of breast of lamb, one of the cheapest cuts of meat you can buy, but prepared in the way I'll describe, it is glorified into a real party dish. The breasts are boned, spread with a succulent stuffing, rolled up and tied in cheesecloth before they are cooked. With the rouladen there will be a fine sauce made from the broth in which the lamb is cooked and, of course, mint jelly. For a hot vegetable we could do no better than plain buttered peas, which make a suitable companion to any lamb dish.

The salad will be undercooked flowerets of cauliflower, marinated in French dressing, julienne beets and chopped raw onion, marinated in French dressing, and salad greens. This is an extra-good combination of tastes and textures; and however it is arranged, it is sure to look pretty. Icebox potato rolls will give an added touch of perfection to the menu. You may want to buy rolls instead of making them yourself, but for the small amount of effort involved I don't know anything that is more appreciated than home-made rolls or bread.

For dessert we'll have apricot-banana sherbet. The only ingredients in this sherbet are dried apricots, bananas and sugar, but it is so smooth and delicious that it tastes as if it were made by some elaborate and difficult formula. Doesn't this sound pretty special?

These recipes will serve six or eight:

HOT CLAM-AND-CHEESE SPREAD

In the top of a double boiler melt 3 tablespoons butter or margarine, add 1 small onion, finely chopped, and ½ green or red sweet pepper, finely chopped, and sauté over direct heat 3 minutes. Add one 10½-ounce can minced clams, drained, ¼ pound processed cheese, cut into small pieces, 4 tablespoons catchup, 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce, 1 tablespoon milk (or sherry, if you prefer) and ¼ teaspoon cayenne or Nepal pepper. Cook in double boiler until cheese has melted, stirring often. Make this the day before if you like. To serve, transfer to a chafing dish or a small casserole placed over a heating device—it must be kept hot all the time. Besides Melba toast and squares of buttered pumpernickel, have some paper-thin slices of garlic dill pickle on the table. A piece of pickle on the toast or bread before the hot spread is added makes it even better.

LAMB ROULADEN

In ordering the lamb breasts, it's a good idea to consult with your butcher in advance. Tell him what you're going to do with the lamb and ask him to save you two breasts that are as nearly oblong in shape as possible. Ask him to remove all bones, tough cartilage and any excess fat.

For the stuffing you will need ¾ pound finely ground raw smoked ham, 1 cup finely chopped celery, 1⅓ cups finely chopped onion, 1 cup blanched almonds cut into fairly small pieces, 1 cup chopped parsley, 1 cup bread crumbs, two 4-ounce cans chopped mushrooms (stems and pieces are fine for this), 3 raw eggs, ½ cup water and 2 small cloves garlic finely minced. (There's a wonderful gadget on the market now for mincing garlic. It's like a tiny potato ricer and it does the job much better than anything I've tried). Mix these ingredients thoroughly and add salt and freshly ground pepper to taste. Be cautious about the salt, because the ham may be extra salty.

Spread lamb breasts flat on a board and have one last hunt for cartilage. A hard piece left in will interfere with slicing the roll neatly. Put half the stuffing on each slab of meat and pat it down firmly so that it covers the entire surface. Starting at the straggly end, roll firmly into a cylinder and tie with cord in five or six places. When finished it resembles a small rolled roast of beef. If some of the stuffing oozes out, scrape it off. Wrap each roll in cheesecloth and tie firmly.

Put rolls in a pot big enough to accommodate both and barely cover with water. Add 6 carrots, cut into chunks, 1 large onion, chopped coarsely, and salt and pepper. Bring to a boil, lower heat to simmer and cook, covered, until meat is tender—about 2½ hours. Turn rolls over occasionally during cooking. When done, transfer rolls to another pan or baking dish, spoon on a little of the broth and keep hot in a very low oven until ready to serve.

Three or three and one-half cups of gravy should be enough, and if you have more broth than this reduce quantity by boiling uncovered. Press through a sieve or vegetable-purée machine. Add salt and pepper if needed, and thicken with cornstarch mixed with water. The gravy should be fairly thin.

As to the timing of the various operations involved in making the rouladen, you can suit yourself. I have done all the cooking, even the gravy, the day before; I have prepared the rouladen for cooking in advance; and I've done the whole job the day it was to be eaten.

Shortly before serving time, remove cheesecloth from lamb rolls and with a very sharp thin-bladed knife cut into slices an inch or a little more thick. Pull off strings as you go along. Transfer slices to a heated platter, cover with aluminum foil or heavy paper and keep hot in a barely turned-on oven or on a hot plate. Before serving, garnish with lots of parsley.

The first and last slices won't be as perfect as the center ones, but with two rolls to work with you'll have plenty of perfect ones and what is left will be fine for a future meal. If you have a home freezer, wrap any leftover rouladen in aluminum foil, laying the slices side by side, not stacked, and freeze. When you are ready to use them, let them thaw and heat, still wrapped in foil, in a low oven. They will be moist and as good as new.

HOT BUTTERED PEAS

Use frozen, fresh or canned peas. Cook with a large lettuce leaf broken into pieces and 1 envelope or cube chicken bouillon dissolved in the water. At the last add a generous lump of butter or margarine and salt and pepper.

I think the double-boiler method is good for cooking peas—you can use less water and there's no danger of burning.

BEET-AND-CAULIFLOWER SALAD

The day before, drain juice from 1 large can julienne beets, or cook fresh beets and cut them into julienne strips. Add 1 medium onion, chopped, or sliced thinly and separated into rings. I like red onions for this dish because they are so delicate and juicy. Add ½ cup salad oil, ¼ cup vinegar, 2 tablespoons sugar, and salt and pepper to taste. Separate a head of cauliflower into flowerets and cook in salted water until just past the hard stage—about 5 minutes. Drain and add ½ cup salad oil, ¼ cup vinegar, and salt to taste. Toss vegetables well and store in refrigerator. The beets will quickly absorb the taste of the dressing, but the cauliflower should be tossed several times more. Wash salad greens—Boston lettuce, romaine, water cress; whatever the market has to offer—drain thoroughly and store in vegetable compartment of refrigerator.

When you are ready to arrange the salad, rub a wooden bowl well with garlic, add greens and French dressing and toss gently until each leaf is coated. A three-compartment dish is nice for serving the salad—greens in the middle and cauliflower and beets at either end. If you use a large round platter, it could be most attractively arranged with some greens in the center, a ring of cauliflower next, then beets and a border of greens. Or you could toss all three vegetables together in the wooden bowl. The

Time for Ideas— a timely service from the meat industry

You can serve this one up homey or "high style." It's an impressive dish in all but cost, and the recipe is on the other side of this page.

"Dinner Party" Stew

Easy reputation builder

Mrs. L. D. Parotte of Memphis, Tennessee, says, "I like to make budget-stretching stews —and my family likes them— because you can get so many different-tasting variations with such simple variations in the recipe."

One of the most praiseworthy things about a woman is her ability to take simple, modest things and put new sparkle and appeal into them.

Here is an example of what you can do with stew. (Haven't you noticed that many a dish that goes by fancy names in the finest restaurants is simply a stew to which an idea has been added?)

In these days of inflated dollars, every new idea for turning budget-priced cuts into eye-appealing and appetite-provoking main dishes helps you spread your meat money over more of the week's meals. That is why the meat industry is using these pages each month to pass along ideas (like this one) that are helping women meet the challenge of the times with typical feminine ingenuity.

There's as much protein in a pound of stew meat as there is in a pound of sirloin steak

All meat furnishes complete, high-quality protein —the right kind of protein with all of the essential building blocks needed for growth . . . for tissue repair . . . for blood regeneration . . . to build resistance to infection and to aid in recovery from illness. That is why meat is called "a yardstick of protein foods"; why it is a key element in the modern reducing diet.

Meat is also an excellent source of essential B vitamins, including B_{12}, the newly discovered vitamin you've been hearing so much about.

Idea with Stew—

or, how to turn a few pieces of meat into a dish that's worth its weight in compliments!

New glamour for an old stand-by...

"Dinner Party" Stew

As a main dish should, this Dinner Party Stew is always good for quite a bit of appreciative table talk, whether you serve it to the family or to guests. To see how good it will look on your table, look at the full-color photo on the other side of this page. To find out how easy it is to make, just try the kitchen-tested recipe below . . . real soon.

Basic Secret

If there's one secret of success for a stew, it's long, slow cooking. Many stews require as much as three hours' cooking time. The pan should be covered and the liquid should simmer (bubble very slowly). The stew is done when the meat cubes are tender when pierced with a fork.

Another important pointer is to add a relatively small amount of liquid at the beginning of the cooking period rather than "drowning" the meat. Two to three cups—enough to barely cover the meat—usually is sufficient. More may be added during the cooking.

Meat stock used in place of water gives a richer flavor. A good quick stock can be easily made by dissolving bouillon cubes or a few teaspoons of meat extract in water.

Onions add a lot to a stew, too. Use plenty of them.

Endless Variations

If there's one good reason for the popularity of stew, it's the many easy variations that can make it a something-different dish every time you serve it. For example:

Vary the meat—you can make your stew with beef, veal, lamb or pork.

Vary the vegetables—there is an infinite number of combinations of vegetables you can use. Besides the familiar potato-carrot-onion trio, use tomatoes, baby lima beans, green peas, celery, leeks. Just go easy on such highly flavored vegetables as parsnips and turnips.

Vary the seasonings—the judicious use of seasonings points up the flavor of the stew and gives it individuality. A few suggestions are garlic, caraway seeds, paprika, Worcestershire sauce, a bay leaf, or a pinch of marjoram, thyme, curry powder or chili powder.

What you serve with it can give a new slant to stew and, at the same time, stretch the good flavor of meat further in the meal. Serve your stew with rice, with noodles, with dumplings, in individual casseroles, as meat pies, as a "meat shortcake" over biscuits.

"Dinner Party" Stew

an old-country favorite brought up to date and made easy for modern homemakers

- 1 pound lean beef chuck, cut into thin strips 2 inches long, or small cubes
- 3 tablespoons flour
- ½ teaspoon salt, dash of pepper
- 3 medium onions, sliced
- 3 tablespoons fat
- ½ cup tomato juice
- 1¾ cups meat stock*
- 1 teaspoon sugar
- ½ cup sour cream
- 1 small can mushrooms (optional)

*or 1¾ cups hot water in which three bouillon cubes or 2 teaspoons beef extract have been dissolved.

1. Roll strips or cubes of beef in flour mixed with salt and pepper. Brown meat and onions in hot fat 10 to 15 minutes.

2. Add tomato juice, meat stock and sugar. Bring to boil, then reduce heat, cover pan and simmer gently 1½ hours, or until tender.

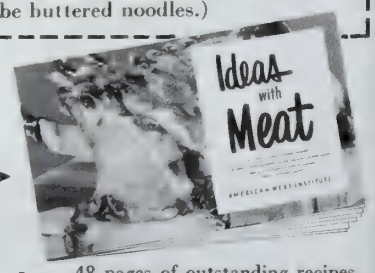
3. When meat is tender, blend in sour cream and mushrooms. Stir well as you bring stew to a boil. Add salt and pepper to suit taste.

4. Serve in a rice ring or simply on cooked rice. (Another good complement for this dish would be buttered noodles.)



Shopping for Stew Meat

Most good cooks agree that, whether it's beef stew, lamb stew or veal stew, the ideal meat for stewing comes from the shoulder, which, fortunately, is one of the most economical cuts. Since we're talking about beef stew here, that means chuck (your meat-man's name for beef shoulder).

Stew meat should be reasonably lean but not all lean.

One pound of boneless meat made into stew serves four people for one meal, but since stew tastes as good reheated as it does fresh-cooked, you may want to make enough for a second day.

important thing is to be sure the salad is ice cold when served.

POTATO ICEBOX ROLLS

The dough for the rolls should be made at least 24 hours in advance. I've kept it under refrigeration for more than a week before it was baked and had perfect results. Boil ¾ pound mealy potatoes with jackets on. Remove skin and press through ricer. Dissolve 1 cake compressed yeast or 1 package quick dry yeast in ½ cup lukewarm water. Scald 1 cup milk with ½ cup shortening and cool to lukewarm. Beat 2 eggs in a bowl with 3 tablespoons sugar and 2½ teaspoons salt and beat with rotary beater. Add yeast, milk and melted shortening and riced potatoes and again beat with rotary beater. Sift before measuring 5½ cups flour, and beat flour into liquids until too stiff to handle with a spoon. Knead in the rest of the flour either on a board or in the bowl. Work dough into a ball, transfer to a large greased bowl and spread top with softened shortening. Put on bowl cover that has an elastic band, cover with a heavy plate and store in refrigerator for at least 24 hours.

> To know is nothing at all; to imagine is everything.
> —ANATOLE FRANCE.

About 2½ hours before baking time, remove covers and cut through dough with a knife in all directions to reduce bubbles. Grease muffin tins and fill ⅓ full of dough. This can be done with a spoon, or you can grease your hands, gouge out a little hunk of dough and roll it into more or less round shape. Cover the pans with towels, put them in a warm place and let rise until double in bulk—2 to 2½ hours. Bake in a hot—425° F.—oven for 20 minutes or a little less. If you bake them ahead of time, which is a convenient way to do it, put rolls in a large paper sack, crimp the opening together and fasten with a string or rubber band and reheat in a hot—450° F.—oven for 6 or 7 minutes before serving.

This recipe makes 3 dozen or more rolls, depending on size. The unused dough can be kept in the refrigerator and baked a week or more later, or it can be frozen and used much later.

APRICOT-BANANA SHERBET

Cover 1 pound dried apricots with 3½ cups water. Boil briskly 10 minutes, uncovered, cover and simmer 15 minutes. A minute before they are done, stir in ¾ cup sugar. Press through a fine sieve and cool. Press 1½ ripe bananas through a potato ricer, then through a fine sieve, and blend with apricots. If you have an electric blender, the puréeing is a cinch. Let apricots cool to lukewarm, slice the bananas into them and about a minute's buzzing for each containerful will be sufficient.

Freeze in refrigerator or home freezer. After the first hour scrape sides and bottom of freezing tray and beat sherbet to even consistency. Repeat scraping and beating at the end of the second hour. It will take about 4 hours' freezing time in all. If sherbet becomes too hard, remove from freezer and let stand in refrigerator for a while.

To serve, heap sherbet in a bowl or in individual compotes and arrange a border of sliced bananas around it. The bananas can be cut in half and each half sliced into slender sticks, or they can be sliced in rounds.

Service. Some arrangement should be made for eating this meal at a table or tables. Though the lamb rouladen are tender, you do need a knife to cut them, and when a knife is involved I automatically eliminate anything approaching plate juggling. Not that I have anything against buffet service, where you fill your plate and carry it wherever you like—in fact, for parties of more than eight I follow this pattern most of the time. But the food must be planned for it, or comfort, that prime essential to the enjoyment of a good meal, is sacrificed. So far as your own comfort is concerned in producing this menu—kitchen and servicewise—I can't see any problems ahead, so I might as well wish you a good Thanksgiving and close up my typewriter.

"WHY DON'T YOU GET OUT OF TOWN?"

the rubbish, pushing dilapidated baby carriages which were their trade-mark, and in which they carried their gleanings. She had to wheel Suzanne's carriage around one of those now-familiar figures sprawled on the sidewalk. A policeman was on the corner; he paid no attention. What impression must such sights make on visitors from all over the world! pondered Connie for the hundredth time.

It was always a relief to pass into the little park with its trees and swings, the East River for its outlook. Connie wheeled Suzanne's carriage to a bench where she could watch boats plying up and down the river. She felt no obligation to get all the enjoyment she could from the park, for it was soon to be taken away. The city was proposing to erect a crosswalk on 51st Street above East River Drive. Big pillars would cut the little park in two and practically obliterate the portion where the children played.

It seemed so senseless. Connie knew that the United Nations had offered the city $2,000 to build a pedestrian walk over the East River Drive. But there was already a crosswalk just up three blocks at 54th Street.

A committee of mothers had been working for more than a year, urging that this be enlarged, thereby saving the city money, and preserving the park. They had held mass meetings, had presented petitions to the mayor, had enlisted the help of city officials, all to no avail.

"It must be politics," the mothers had agreed.

The most they had been able to achieve was a promise that the park would not be torn up until fall. After that, the children of the neighborhood would have to play in the rum-infested streets. The derelicts were always of intense interest to youngsters. Connie had a momentary picture of Suzanne, giggling at the antics of the miserable men as the other children did, or being subjected to their attentions.

On her way home, she found herself walking behind a man who was panhandling on the street. In an attempt to ingratiate himself, he leaned over Suzanne, made clucking noises at her and complimented her fulsomely. Connie remembered the men she had seen with their heads buried in garbage cans, and felt almost nauseated. She jerked the carriage away, and left him behind quickly. But the picture of that filthy figure hovering over her baby stayed with her.

Until now Connie had thought of the homeless men as somebody else's problem. It was her nature to make a quick, decisive, competent attack upon any job she considered hers. But she was feminine too—this was part of her attraction for the highly competent, masculine Dick. She had an instinct against intruding upon what she considered male prerogatives. However, safeguarding her baby is a mother's job, and Connie suddenly saw this clearly.

The minute she got home, she called the 51st Street police station, and was connected with a man who announced rather gruffly that he was Lieutenant Green. After giving her name and address, Connie explained that in the last few months she had been on the streets nearly every day with her baby, and had become aware of the homeless men and their ever-increasing number.

"Their language, their habits and their actions are revolting," she told him. "My daughter is a baby now, but in the not too distant future she will be old enough to be out by herself and I would be just sick if she ever had any contact with these men."

Molasses Lace Cookies

- ¾ cup granulated sugar
- ½ cup BRER RABBIT New Orleans MOLASSES*
- ⅓ cup water
- ¾ cup butter (or margarine)
- 1¼ cups sifted all-purpose flour
- 1½ teaspoons baking powder
- 1¼ teaspoons cinnamon
- 1 cup chopped pecans (or walnuts)

Combine sugar, molasses, water and butter in saucepan and heat until it just begins to boil. Remove from heat, stir until butter melts. Sift together flour, baking powder and cinnamon, add. Fold in nut meats. Drop by teaspoonfuls on cookie sheets about 3 inches apart. Bake in a slow oven, 325° F., about 12 minutes. Let cool about 1 minute, then remove with spatula before they harden, and place on waxed paper. Yield: about 4 dozen.

At first Lieutenant Green merely grunted, but as Connie went on, his voice became pleasant and sympathetic. He told her that he himself had been very much aware of all this, but doubted that the problem would ever be brought under control.

"The trouble is, the police in New York are so undermanned right now that a patrolman who ordinarily should be assigned to one or two blocks has six or seven blocks to cover. He can't spend the time looking after derelicts, since his job is controlling crime. Of the eight million people in New York City, we ought to put away more than we do, but we just haven't the men."

"But isn't there something that can be done about these men?" Connie asked.

"Yes, there is," answered the lieutenant. "We picked up sixteen just last night and locked them up."

"Fine," said Connie. "I can point out sixteen more right now from my front window."

Said Lieutenant Green, "We'll pick them up and the same thing will happen that happened to the sixteen we picked up last night. They were released this morning by the court!"

A short time after her call, Connie saw a patrol wagon pick up nine men in her block. But it was to little avail if the men were to be released the next day.

Connie had an intellectual curiosity which kept her mind working on the problem. Lieutenant Green had sounded nice and human. Next day she asked a neighbor to stay with Suzanne a little while. A bit timidly, for this kind of thing was a new venture, Connie walked to the narrow, soot-blackened building that was the 51st Street station.

Men standing at the entrance of the firehouse next door looked at her curiously as she went up the steps and into a rather small room with walls painted light green. At her right was a high desk, with switchboard beyond it. A man in uniform was operating the switchboard, another sat on a platform behind the desk, several officers were standing about, talking. No one paid any attention to Connie, but a sign on the desk directed visitors to state their business, so she asked the man behind the desk for Lieutenant Green.

"I'm Lieutenant Green," he replied, "What can I do for you?"

As soon as Lieutenant Green identified her as the woman who had talked to him over the phone, he left the desk and took her to a corner of the room where they could talk more privately.

Lieutenant Green was about thirty-five, and well built for his height of five feet ten or so. Connie thought he had the bluest eyes she had ever seen. They were searching eyes, and Connie felt they were honest ones too. Lieutenant Green, on his part, saw a simply dressed girl with well-modeled features, dark hair drawn back and tied with a bow at the back of her neck, face framed by curly tendrils. Her gray eyes met his candidly—a type of young woman seldom seen in police stations! His manner toward her was deferential, he answered her questions with every appearance of frankness.

WHEN she asked where the men came from, he told her, "Some come up from the Bowery. That's their regular stamping ground. Some live in cheap flophouses nearby. Others more or less just exist, sleeping where they fall. When I was a patrolman in the Chinatown area, we would pick up from forty to fifty every night, book them, and they would be out the next morning, right back where they were picked up. Some of these men have been booked as many as seventy-five times. They don't care whether they are picked up or not. If they are, it means sleeping quarters for the night, and in the winter they are glad of it. You are right in feeling they are a threat to society. Of course the greater percentage of them are sick, and many could be helped if they were taken in hand. But we just don't have the facilities to do that."

"Lieutenant Green, are you a father?" Connie said.

"I certainly am. I have two girls."

"Do you live in Manhattan?"

"Indeed I do not! I live as far out i Queens as I can get. My advice to you is t get out of Manhattan, too, just as soon a you can."

"But we can't right now. Would it help if were to take this problem to someone highe up?" Connie made a final effort.

"I don't believe you would get anywher with it," Lieutenant Green replied. "I sug gest that you just shut your eyes to the whol thing, and make tracks out of Manhattan a the first opportunity. Don't hesitate, though to call me if you are ever bothered personall by a bum. We'll pick up the man, and we'll b of service whenever we can."

CONNIE came away with mixed feelings The situation with regard to the bum seemed hopeless, but she felt that Lieutenan Green was a person of fine caliber. It was re assuring to know that there was a man of th type to whom she could go in an emergency

For two days after that, the streets wer pretty well clear of bums. Her visit to th station had accomplished something afte all! Then after the little interlude they wer back in full force. On Sunday morning, whe she and Dick went to church, they foun another telltale puddle in their entrance hal

That night Dick and Connie talked th situation over. They felt it was a police prob lem, and that there should be something th police could do. But they felt it was a huma problem too. They wondered why these me had appeared on the streets so suddenly—i the three or four years tha Dick had lived in the v cinity before his marriag he had not been aware o them. They agreed that was criminally negligen on the part of the autho ities to let emotionally sic men wander the streets, a possible menac to women and children. Wasn't this a matte for the Welfare Department?

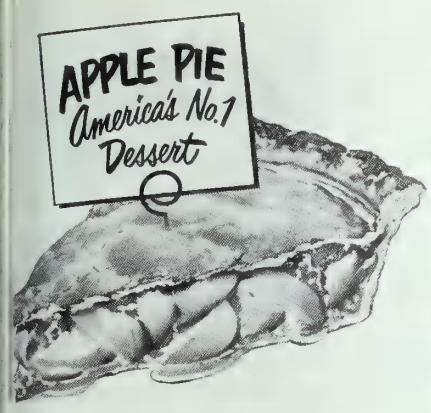
Their reflections were interrupted by phone call from one of the mothers who ha been fighting to save the park. A final dem onstration was to be held on May twenty third. Connie was one of hundreds of mother who thronged to the 51st Street school wit their baby carriages just as school let ou Connie thought the demonstration a bi success. The police were co-operative, ther were newspaper reporters and photographer all over the place. But the next day when sh went through the papers, only in the World Telegram could she find any mention of th baby-carriage barricade. She called one of th mothers on the committee to ask what ha happened.



"The story must have been killed," Mr Powers replied.

Mrs. Powers added that her committe had talked with Mr. Wagner, the Boroug President, and with Mr. Hand, who wa Commissioner of Borough Works. Both ha been pleasant, but had said the crosswalk wa definitely going through at 51st Street. M Hand did say he would do everything in h power to delay the work until fall. With tha small satisfaction they would have to b content.

Then one morning Connie looked out he window and saw that Second Avenue wa flooded with policemen! There were two a each intersection, and several in between. A first she thought her appeals had been an swered. Then she saw that the policemen wer there because of the new traffic rule whic had changed Second Avenue to a one-wa street. After a few days the extra officer vanished.

Pondered Connie, If New York City ca produce all these extra men when it is a questio of traffic, why can't there be more patrolmen?

However, there seemed nothing more to b done about the police. Connie decided to fo low the idea she and Dick had had of explo ing the welfare angle. Calling the Communit Service Society, she was referred to a ca worker at the branch in Yorkville. Conn again left Suzanne with a friendly neighb and made the long trip to Yorkville. The ca worker was nice, but seemed to know noth ing whatever about the problem of the bums. She agreed that it was not very pleasant to come in constant contact with these people, but she did not think there was anything Connie could do about it.

"My advice to you is to get out of Manhattan" was the best she could offer. Just like Lieutenant Green, thought Connie. However, the case worker did suggest that Connie should get in touch with her local political club or party group if she wished to go on with the matter. She also promised to investigate and let Connie know if there was an agency or society which handled this problem.

Now Connie's fighting blood was aroused. She and Dick would like to get out of Manhattan, in common with many New Yorkers who had children. But she didn't propose to be driven out by bums and derelicts. Would it do any good to work through political channels, as the case worker had suggested? Connie rather doubted it after the experience of the mothers' committee. Nevertheless she wouldn't know until she had tried.

Activity along political lines was a new thought for Connie. A Republican herself, though Dick was a Democrat, the only part she had played in politics hitherto was to vote in the general elections. She didn't even know what a political club was, but Dick proved to be a fount of information.

SINCE Dick had a speaking acquaintance with the local Democratic boss, Bill Connolly, the Democratic Club would be the one, and it was only a block away. Mr. Connolly owned the bar at the corner of 52nd and Second Avenue which was a hangout for political figures in the neighborhood. Mr. Connolly himself was the district leader. Dick would make an appointment for her to see Connolly, just like that!

And in fact, Connolly did call Connie, soon after Dick had left a message at the bar requesting that he do so. They made an appointment to meet at his bar the following Saturday afternoon.

Connie went, but Mr. Connolly didn't appear. It was a very clean, quiet, well-conducted bar, a neighborhood gathering place rather than a saloon. Connie didn't mind waiting there, but she thought Mr. Connolly might have sent her a message if he couldn't come.

Dick was rather crestfallen, but fell in with Connie's suggestion that they give the club a try. From the bartender Dick learned that there was a meeting every Thursday night. The following Thursday, Dick and Connie went through the door which said on the outside "Tammany Club, Democratic Party Organization," and climbed to the clubroom on the second floor.

They entered a huge, low-ceilinged room. At the back, several offices were partitioned off. Rows of folding chairs had been set up on the window side. Connie was a little surprised to find that there were no flags, no bunting or other decorations. A tall, well-built, well-dressed, middle-aged man was talking to a small group. Dick told Connie that that was Connolly.

By the time the meeting began, half an hour later, about seventy-five people were there. It proceeded like any other meeting, with the reading of minutes and reports of members who were ill and of those who had recovered from illness. A woman whom Connie later found out to be Miss Marion Curry, codistrict leader with Connolly, then arose and thanked the members for their fine co-operation throughout the year. She was a short, stocky woman with a capable, nonsense air about her.

Next Mr. Connolly got up and announced that this would be the last meeting until fall. He said the club, however, would stay open six days a week throughout the summer with someone always in attendance, and anyone who had a problem or trouble was welcome to come.

Connolly was the first political boss that Connie had ever seen. She studied him with interest. He was far from resembling the coarse, big-stomached politician of the cartoons. Nevertheless, the practiced smooth-

Beatrice Cooke's Mealtime Adventures

FOR NOVEMBER: Corn Oyster Chowder, Bridge Party Chop Suey, Ready-to-Serve Holiday Dessert

Pilgrims' pride in a Tureen!

Here we are again in the month for celebrating Thanksgiving and the courage of our Pilgrim forefathers. Thanksgiving always makes me think of the golden Indian corn which was so important to those early settlers. And of a recipe which uses both corn and oysters —two of the foods the Pilgrims liked so well. It's a warming, hearty dish I think you and your family will enjoy.

Corn Oyster Chowder

- ½ cup Meadow Gold Butter
- ½ cup finely diced onion
- 1 cup oysters
- 5 cups Meadow Gold Homogenized Milk, scalded
- 2 teaspoons salt
- Pepper
- Dash cayenne
- 2 cups cooked diced potatoes
- 1⅔ cups cooked whole kernel corn
- 1 teaspoon LaChoy Soy Sauce

Cook onions and oysters in butter until edges of oysters begin to curl. Add hot milk, seasonings, potatoes, corn and soy sauce to chowder. Serve hot. Makes 6 servings.

For this recipe I hope you can get MEADOW GOLD MILK because I know how Meadow Gold is cared for. It's put under refrigeration within an hour of its production and is pasteurized and bottled in plants as sparkling clean as your own kitchen. And the same is true for churn-fresh MEADOW GOLD BUTTER. Every pound of rich, delicate MEADOW GOLD BUTTER is made in creameries so clean that even the air is filtered! And it's made by the people whose fifty years in the business have taught them every butter-making secret. You'll like MEADOW GOLD BUTTER and MILK. Won't you try them soon?

The squaws would never know this squash!

Squash is another really American dish for which we can thank the friendly Indians of Pilgrim days. But here's a way to serve the humble vegetable that gives a melt-in-the-mouth goodness the Indians could never imagine!

Cheese Stuffed Squash

- 3 acorn squash
- 2 tablespoons chopped green pepper
- 2 tablespoons chopped onion
- ⅓ cup Meadow Gold Butter, melted
- 2 cups grated Meadow Gold American Process Cheese
- 3 cups soft bread crumbs
- 1 tsp. salt ⅛ tsp. pepper
- 4 slices bacon, cooked and crumbled

Cut squash in half; remove seeds. Brush with melted butter; place cut side down on greased pan. Bake in moderate oven (375°) 30 minutes. Scoop out centers, mash and combine with remaining ingredients. Refill squash shells; return to oven and bake 25 minutes. Serves 6.

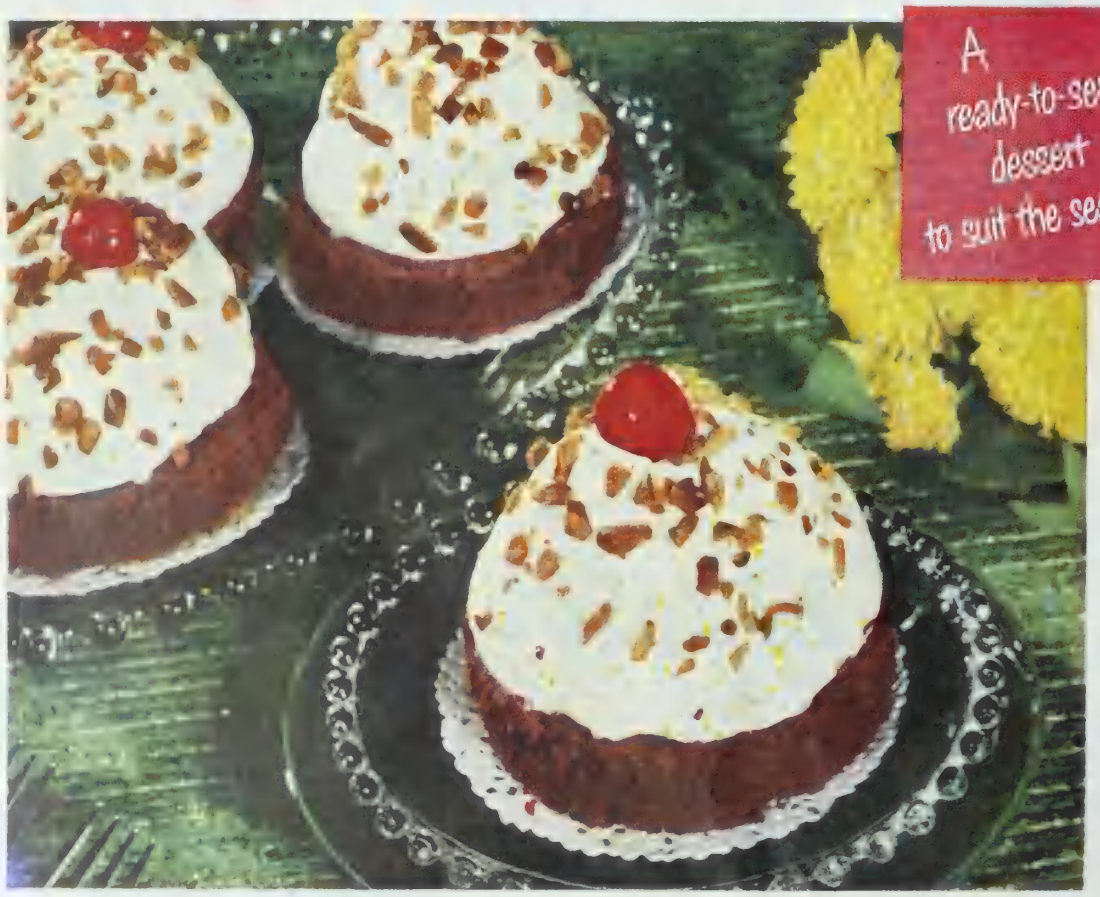
You never thought of cheese with squash? Well, I rather imagine you'll never think of squash without cheese once you taste this. Especially if you're sure to use MEADOW GOLD CHEESE! For MEADOW GOLD has the finest natural cheese flavor combined with a blending quality that just can't be topped. And MEADOW GOLD PROCESSED AMERICAN CHEESE is made to melt smoothly with no stringing. So be sure that your cheese is MEADOW GOLD, won't you?

An Oriental answer to a bridge party problem

I guess most of us have wondered frantically at some time or other what in the world we could serve for a bridge club luncheon. We want something that will excite comment for its tastiness. But we want it easy to prepare. And here I have the answer to that problem!

Bridge Party Chop Suey or Chow Mein

- ¾ cup Meadow Gold Butter
- 2½ lbs. lean pork or chicken —uncooked, cut in thin strips
- 3 cups onions, cut fine
- 1 tbsp. salt ½ tsp. pepper
- 6 cups celery, cut fine
- 3½ cups hot water or stock
- 3 cans LaChoy Mixed Chinese Vegetables (drained well)



for flavoring, thickening:

- ⅓ cup cold water
- 6 tablespoons cornstarch
- 2 tablespoons LaChoy Soy Sauce
- 1 tablespoon sugar
- 3 tablespoons of LaChoy Brown Gravy Sauce, if Chop Suey is desired

Melt butter in hot skillet. Add meat, stir and sear quickly (without browning or burning), add onions and fry for five minutes. Add celery, salt and pepper and hot water. Cover and cook for ten minutes. Add drained LaChoy Mixed Chinese Vegetables. Mix thoroughly and heat to boiling point. Combine and add flavoring and thickening ingredients. Stir lightly and cook for two minutes. Serve piping hot with LaChoy Noodles for Chow Mein or cooked rice for Chop Suey. Flavor individual dishes to taste with LaChoy Soy Sauce.

With those wonderful, dependable LaChoy products you have an exotic dish to serve 12 people in 25 minutes. Every full-packed can of LA CHOY CHINESE VEGETABLES contains crispy-textured water chestnuts, bean sprouts, bamboo shoots, mushrooms and pimientos—ingredients for a made-in-Chinatown taste! I've actually seen these foods prepared in spotless American kitchens so I know they're good.

ness of his manner gave Connie the feeling that she could have picked him out as being a politician.

The only mention of politics came when Connolly told the group that he was meeting opposition in the coming primary election. Mr. Dufficy, at one time an active member of the club, was running for district leader. Mr. Connolly seemed hurt and upset that a one-time friend and coworker should be against him. He asked for the complete support of all members and urged everyone to work doubly hard this summer. The meeting lasted only half an hour, then refreshments were served. No one spoke to the Sycafooses or came near them during the whole time they were there. Connie figured up her score to date in working along political lines. Two tries, two brush-offs—zero!

And the men in the streets were more numerous and annoying than ever. Connie saw a woman leave a donation at the door of the Salvation Army depot across the street, closed for the noon hour. A minute later, a bum had made off with the bundle. A neighbor reported that her cleaning woman had found two bums sleeping in the hallway. When she ordered them out, one had struck her with a bottle, but she had routed them with her mop. Another neighbor learned that a dinner guest, upon arriving, had found a drunken man stretched out in the vestibule and had been afraid to come in.

"Why didn't you call the police?" asked Connie.

"What good would it do? The other night I saw a man fall flat on his face across the street. After he had been there an hour I thought he might be dead and called the police. They said they would send a car immediately to pick him up. I watched for an hour and a half and they hadn't come. Then I gave up and went to bed. The next morning he was gone, so I suppose he was alive. If he hadn't been, I imagine he would be there yet!"

That set Connie thinking about the police again. It had been drilled into her from her years in business that if you want to get something accomplished, you should go to the person at the top. Thomas F. Murphy, then Police Commissioner, had been very much in the news as the fearless and dogged prosecutor of the top communists. He had been made Police Commissioner of New York City for the express purpose of cleaning up the city. She wrote to Commissioner Murphy, setting forth strongly but courteously her experiences both with the bums and with police protection in the neighborhood. Days went by. No answer came, not even an acknowledgment.

CONNIE's mind kept working on the problem just the same. Lieutenant Green had told her that the hands of police were tied as long as the men committed no crimes. But wasn't it a crime, or at least a misdemeanor, to loiter about streets, to litter walks and gutters with garbage, to lie on the sidewalk in a state of intoxication? She called the City Clerk's office and asked to be directed to someone who could tell her about laws covering vagrancy. She was switched to the City Council, where she was told that there was no one at City Hall who could give her such information.

Connie refused to give up. Next day she took the subway down to Centre Street. A hunt through the maze of big buildings that house New York City's municipal affairs finally brought her to a Mr. Burns, who proved to be a detective, and who assured her that there were indeed vagrancy laws. All she had to do was to call the nearest police station and they would pick the men up. When Connie related her experiences with the 51st Street station, Mr. Burns agreed that there was a shortage of policemen at the time, but said he would contact the 51st Street station himself and see if more couldn't be done. Her letter to Commissioner Murphy, he suggested, had probably been sent to the 51st Street station for them to act upon. Connie had begun with the 51st Street station. Now she found herself back exactly where she had started.

NEXT morning Mrs. Shulman, of the Mothers' Park Committee, called Connie. Early visitors to the park had found the gate locked, and bulldozers tearing up the surface! The mothers had counted on the use of the park until fall, and here it was only June seventh! They were getting up a demonstration for that afternoon. Would Connie bring Suzanne in her buggy, and would she call as many other mothers as she could? Connie spent the rest of the morning and the early afternoon on the phone. At three o'clock several hundred mothers were there, but not a single reporter or photographer showed up. The committee members were sure they had been stopped by city officials. A group went to the mayor's office, but did not succeed in seeing His Honor. They returned, tired and mad.

"We'll demonstrate again tomorrow," they said, "and keep demonstrating until the papers pay attention!"

A much smaller group showed up the next day, but this time reporters were there, and at the request of one of them, Connie tried to wheel baby Suzanne's buggy into the park. All the paving had been removed except for one small area, and nothing was left but cinders, rocks and mud. Suzanne's buggy bogged down promptly. Older children began pelting one another with mud and dirt. Those with tricycles found it impossible to ride them.

Rumors were flying about: that a city official was present, but wouldn't talk; that tearing up the park had been a mistake, and it was all to be put in order again until fall.

Oh, yeah? thought Connie to herself. Like the other mothers, she was both furious and heartsick. What kind of city government was it that permitted derelicts to take over the streets, and deliberately tore up the one place where children could play?

That night a Democratic Party worker came by with a petition for Connolly. Connie shot questions at him, first about the petition. It was for the coming Democratic primary. Connolly was running for re-election as leader of the 8th Assembly District, one of sixteen Assembly districts in Manhattan. District committeemen were to be elected, also, and party candidates would be nominated for the general election in November. The worker didn't seem to know much about them, though, or to be interested in anything except getting Connolly re-elected.

Connie asked why Mr. Dufficy was challenging Connolly's leadership. The worker said he understood it was because Mr. Dufficy, a lawyer, had thought he deserved a municipal judgeship, and Connolly had recommended another man. The worker invited Dick and Connie to come to the club any time they had a problem. That was what "Bill and Marion," as he called Connolly and Miss Curry, were there for. It seemed to Dick and Connie, however, that the party troubled itself about them only when they could be of use to Connolly. After their cool reception at

I made a little pie so fine,
Hey deigh, a deigh, a deigh!
I made it all in such a way
With a crisscross here and a pretty line;
I made it of apples and sugar and spice,
All for love of a man so nice,
Who'll taste it and eat it and probably cry:
What a queer little, dear little bit of a pie!
Hey deigh, a deigh, a deigh—
At least that's what I hope he'll say!

the club, they were not inclined to go back there again.

A few days later the Sycafooses departed for their vacation at Dick's home in West Virginia. The West Virginia valley, folded among the hills, seemed a heaven in contrast to New York, so cool, so beautiful, so peaceful that Dick and Connie wished they could stay there forever. But Dick's work and school were in New York City, their future lay there, at least for the present.

They returned on a hot, humid Sunday. That afternoon Connie wheeled Suzanne over to the park. It was completely restored, even in better shape than before! Connie could hardly believe her eyes.

Still another pleasant surprise was in store. That evening the buzzer rang at the front door. It was a policeman, who explained that he had come in reference to her letter to Commissioner Murphy and had been here several times before.

Like Lieutenant Green, he seemed a man of high caliber and went over the problem of the vagrants with Connie at length. He said this was something the police had been working on for years, but he doubted if it would ever be brought under control. Every so often they would have a big campaign and clean out one section or another, but the bums would just go to another section and gradually work their way back. They got liquor in low-class stores which would cater to them. They existed on the money they could get from selling what they found in scavenging.

Connie learned one other thing she hadn't known before. Every time a policeman picked up a bum, he had to appear in court with him. Since hearings often came on off hours, the officer said that in most cases this had to be done on the patrolman's own time. She could understand that patrolmen would not wish to get too deeply involved with derelicts under these circumstances.

> The whole of government consists in the art of being honest. —THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Their visitor couldn't have been nicer, and he promised to see that two plain-clothes men were assigned to the area of the apartment. At least someone was paying attention!

The next day Connie received a letter from the case worker of the welfare agency, asking Connie to call her. She had ascertained that there was a rehabilitation center on Hart Island, though it could care for only 250 men at a time and they must come voluntarily. It had been set up under the auspices of the Welfare Council, and the worker suggested the council as a good source of information.

Now came a letter from Mr. Connolly and Miss Curry (signed chummily "Bill and Marion"), asking for the support of the Sycafooses in the coming primary election. It recalled to Connie the suggestion of the woman at the welfare agency that she should work through political channels. By this time Connie could see that the problem of the bums was in truth a political matter, going to the core of the city's government. About this she knew nothing except what she had picked up at the Tammany Club and from the party worker. Dick, it developed, knew little more than she did. Wouldn't she be able to function more intelligently if she knew what the party mechanism was? For the moment Connie decided to pursue this angle.

Many phone calls and trips to the library were required, but it was well worth the effort. New York City's political history under the world-renowned Tammany Hall had been colorful, and was the subject of many books. Each night when Dick came home, Connie had some new titbit for him from her reading. Dick was delighted that Connie was getting such a kick out of this new interest.

Connie learned that the party structure was as clearly defined as that of an army, with as direct a line of command. In New York City, election-district captains were responsible to district leaders like Connolly, and they in turn were responsible to the higher officials.

Dick and Connie were surprised to find that the slates submitted at the general elections were made up by the party bosses, and simply blueprinted by the tiny handful of the faithful who turned out to vote in the primary. Even Supreme Court justices and high state officials, nominated in conventions by delegates, were picked by the bosses, because the bosses chose the delegates. City magistrates and assistants to the district attorney were appointed from recommendations made by the district leaders. Connie thought she had a better understanding of the fuss between Connolly and Dufficy.

In the light of her new store of knowledge, Connie surveyed the situation again. She realized that the district leader was a much more powerful figure than they had known, and had access to the inner circles of the city government. It seemed to Connie that the fight between Connolly and Dufficy might sharpen the ears of the respective candidates to grievances of voters. She felt a very practical politician indeed as she plotted a campaign—to sound out both candidates on the subject of the bums, and see which one seemed more inclined to do something effective about them.

Connie knew that she would not be able to vote for either man herself. In the first place, the New York law required one to register the previous October in order to vote in the August primary, and that particular October, Connie had been in the hospital having Suzanne. In the second place, in New York State only persons registered as Democrats can vote in the Democratic primary, and Connie had always been Republican. She had found nothing in the law, however, that would keep her from talking to Democratic mothers in the neighborhood, and she didn't think the Democrats would mind.

She decided to see Connolly first. Again Dick and Connie climbed the steps to the big clubroom. This time "Marion" approached them as soon as they entered and asked if she could help them. While they waited to see Mr. Connolly, they chatted with her about Connolly's chances in the primary. Marion said that Dufficy was not well known in the district and could not possibly get anywhere. Connie was impressed by her directness and her air of competence.

When Connolly emerged from his office, he apologized profusely for having kept them waiting. He remembered Connie's previous appointment with him, and said he had counted on the bartender to tell her that he had been called to Tammany Hall on important business. He apologized for that too.

They were interrupted frequently. Connolly explained that he was at the club six nights a week and usually saw about twenty people each time. It was part of his job, he said, to act as intermediary for people with small problems; as when rents had been raised, or a landlord would not carry out his obligations. When people in his district were forced to go into court, he would get a lawyer for them if they wanted him to. He also acted as a liaison between the people of his district and the higher-ups. It sounded to Connie as though she had come to the right place.

He listened attentively while Connie went through her story, then said that he had been very much aware of the problem himself, and had tried to do something about it.

"Up until five years or so ago, you never saw this kind of thing around here. In La Guardia's day there were hospitals to which the men could be sent for treatment and rehabilitation. They did a lot of good too. A great many men were put back on their feet. But after La Guardia, the hospitals were all closed for lack of funds.

"Just last week I talked to the patrolman on the beat about the bums and he said he couldn't do anything about them at all. If he called the station, they laughed at him. If he threatened the men, they sassed him back and told him to go ahead and lock them up, they'd get a square meal and a night's lodging.

"The only thing I can suggest—and I've done a lot of thinking about this—would be to arouse public interest by having someone like Arthur Godfrey or Ed Sullivan give it publicity on his radio program. If people know what is going on and will send in even a dollar apiece, we might get the money to do something about these men.

"Anyway, we can't do much now, because people are away and everything dies down in the summer. But if you still want to do something about this when September comes, come and see me and I'll do all I can."

When they left, Connie said to Dick, "I have a better feeling about Connolly now than I did the last time I was here. He is the first person I have encountered who seems willing to try to do anything. I felt he was sincere in his offer to help." But when Connie repeated this reaction to a neighbor, the reply was a cynical, "Politicians are never sincere. They are just politic!" Connie wondered whether she might have been naive in accepting Connolly's statements at their face value.

The next Saturday an incident occurred that raised Connie's long-simmering indignation to boiling anger. As she came home from the park, a drunken derelict lost his balance and started to fall into Suzanne's carriage. At the last second he righted himself, but Connie found herself shaking with fright and rage. She couldn't get Suzanne back quickly enough to the safety of the apartment, thanking her stars that this was Saturday afternoon and Dick was at home. Later, when she went out to buy groceries, she saw the same derelict stretched out on the sidewalk at the corner of 51st and Second Avenue. Children were standing around him, pointing and laughing. Connie interrupted her shopping to go back home and call the 51st Street station. She was told that Lieutenant Green was off duty, but a patrolman said they would send a man right over. It was then 4:15. Dick and Connie watched out the window.

Half an hour later the man was still on the sidewalk, although two patrol cars had gone by in the meantime. At 4:50, they saw a patrolman go up to the derelict and poke him with his stick. The derelict finally staggered to his feet and went weaving off down the street. That made Connie so mad that she called the station again. The man at the desk said they had sent a patrolman over.

"I saw the patrolman arrive, and all he did was get the man on his feet and let him go. Why wasn't the man picked up?" demanded Connie.

"Unless you charge the man with misconduct, there is nothing we can arrest him for."

"But I told you he was so drunk he couldn't stand up, and all but fell on top of my baby!" said Connie, getting madder and madder. "I've talked to Lieutenant Green about this situation. He said that if I was ever bothered, I should call your station and the man would be picked up."

"Lady, I can't help that. If you want to come over to the station and prefer charges against this man, we'll arrest him. Of course. Then you'll have to appear in court."

Connie slammed up the phone. "I am certainly getting nowhere fast!" she sputtered to Dick. "I think one trouble is that the police are too good to these men. They ought to put them on bread and water for a first offense and at hard labor for the second. Lots of the men are able to work. I'll bet they would if they had to. The only thing to do is to get men into office who have enough civic pride to see that the police handle this matter!"

Connie was so exercised that the following Monday she went to the 51st Street station to talk to Lieutenant Green, only to find that he was on vacation and would be away for several weeks. She realized then that her confidence in police protection had been pinned upon Lieutenant Green. So far as the department itself was concerned, she had accomplished nothing.

Once more Dick and Connie talked things over. From the gossip he heard around the neighborhood, Dick thought Marion was right in saying Dufficy's candidacy stood little chance. They decided it was no use to sound him out, particularly as Connolly had shown as co-operative a spirit as they could have asked for.

"I think I ought to get out and work for Connolly's re-election on a no-more-bums ticket," Connie declared. "I ought to stir up all the feeling in the district that I can."

The next Thursday night Dick and Connie went to the club for the third time and had an even more cordial reception from Mr. Connolly. Connie told him about her experience of the preceding Saturday. He said he was not surprised, because the 51st Street station didn't have a wagon. "I know those people over there and they are lovely people. But if the patrolman had picked up the derelict and taken him in, he would have had to throw him over his shoulder. When they want a wagon, they have to call another precinct."

Connolly did not think the police department was understaffed. "Both O'Dwyer and Impellitteri have worked to increase the police force, and now it has twenty-one thousand men. There were policemen enough and money enough to keep the bums under control in La Guardia's day. What is really needed is more money allocated to the police, so they can have better equipment. And the hospitals for derelicts should be set up again."

Connolly was most appreciative of Connie's offer to help in his campaign. At the end of July and early in August there would be plenty to do, he said, addressing envelopes or canvassing. He promised to let her know when there would be a job for her.

However, no call came, although Connie, meeting Marion Curry on the street, again expressed her desire to be of help. Then the Friday before the Tuesday primary, things began to happen.

A broadside from Dufficy arrived in the mail, charging Connolly with association with Frank Costello, the racketeer widely publicized by the Kefauver Crime Investigating Committee. Connie was horrified; she had watched some of the television broadcasts of the Kefauver hearings, and thinking it over now, she realized that her original indifference to big-city politics had deepened to distrust as she watched those broadcasts demonstrating again and again the link between organized crime and city government. And now Connolly, whose manner had persuaded her of his sincerity, was described as an associate of Costello! How naïve could you be?

"I wouldn't vote for him on a bet," Connie told Dick that night. "I guess politics is no place for me."

Dick, though, took a calmer view. A politician comes into contact with all kinds of people, he said, and anyway, last-minute charges weren't going to change his mind. He still felt Connolly was sincere and he still intended to vote for him.

In Sunday's paper, Connie puzzled over a newspaper story which informed her of something she hadn't realized before—that the local Connolly-Dufficy contest was part of a city-wide factional fight for control of the Democratic Party organization. The charges against Connolly seemed less damaging when she read that each side was accusing the other of Costelloism. Maybe it was no more than a political maneuver, as Dick had said.

But the details of the story, as she told Dick, were all difficult for her. "I'm so mixed up, maybe it's just as well nobody's asked me to do anything in this primary!" Even so, she wanted to get some impartial facts about the two men, as a measure of her personal judgment, and as a guide for the future.

So on Monday she called the Citizens' Union and the League of Women Voters, to see whether these organizations had investigated the candidates for party offices. Neither had, though the Citizens' Union said this was something that should be done, and wished they had the staff to do it. The League said that if any investigation is made it is through the party.

Back to the party again! After dinner that night—the eve of the primaries—Connie and Dick set out once more, to see both Mr. Connolly and Mr. Dufficy. Connolly met them with open arms, and when Connie told him frankly why she had come, said he was awfully glad she'd brought it up.

He said that many years before, while working for Mike Jacobs, a sports promoter, he'd "naturally met Mr. Costello but never associated with him other than to sell him tickets." Several years later he again met Mr. Costello at a dinner at the Waldorf, but hardly recognized him. "Actually if you were in Macy's or Gimbel's the same time Costello was there it's no reason for people to suspect you are intimate with him."

After hearing Connolly's side of the story, Connie felt again that he personally was a pretty good guy, and her opinion was not altered by anything Mr. Dufficy said, when she and Dick found him at headquarters. She felt that she was too new to politics to judge whether the contest between Connolly and Dufficy was simply a fight for power, or was really a matter of principle.

Would Connolly do anything about the bums, Connie wondered, when she read in Wednesday's paper that he'd won? Perhaps organized protest from other mothers in the neighborhood would help, though that method apparently hadn't saved the park. For in the afternoon, when she took Suzanne out for her airing, she encountered surveyors mapping out the crosswalk, which they said would be started in the fall. So much for the mothers' efforts.

"Well, Curly, what do you think about politics?" Dick asked her that night.

"I'm confused and baffled and disappointed. I think I could read about it for ten years and still not know what's going on!"

The trouble was, Connie realized, too many people like herself and Dick had withdrawn entirely from politics in New York. They had left things to the "party" or to the "machine" or to their "elected representatives." They hadn't given as much thought to politics, many of them, as they had to keeping their windows clean, for instance. Yet how much more it affected every moment of their lives. What wonder that politicians had formed a closed corporation, paying lip service to the public, actually trying to keep the public out. Just one sporadic personal effort couldn't break through a system like that.

In a smaller place, Dick pointed out, it wouldn't be so difficult, for you'd have a better chance to know the candidates for office and to judge their qualifications. In a city, the average citizen would have to take a lot of time and trouble even to be an informed voter. But in a way, their neighborhood was a community within a community, and maybe the community approach was the right one. "Anyway, what else is there to do—'get out of town'?"

"Not everybody can get out of town, and neither can we, right now," said Connie. "The trouble is, most people stay away from politics because they don't think they can do anything. Maybe one ordinary citizen can't—but a lot of ordinary citizens can. If enough people like us got busy and worked in the party, maybe we'd get something done—right here in our own back yard." THE END

MAKE YOUR START

Qualify as a Voter. Registration is usually required. Ask at the city hall or county seat for date and place. In some states you must reregister before a presidential election or when you fail to vote; and always when you move to another precinct or change your name.

Study Your Government. Find out what the people do who get elected or appointed. Who represents you in Washington, at the state capital, the city hall? The League of Women Voters will help you; or get a group of friends to study together. It is more fun that way.

Choose Your Political Party. When you vote at a primary election you declare your party choice. Just ordinary citizens—you and I—can have their say about what they want done in government and who does it through political parties. The local precinct is your base of operations.

Have a Voice in Party Affairs. Before the primary election, workers talk over people for precinct workers, committeemen and convention delegates. These meetings are called caucuses. If you do not find a newspaper notice, ask your committee man or woman (their names are filed at the city hall or county seat) to let you know the place and time of the next caucus meeting.

Work for Your Party. Both before and after elections. Find out what party leaders do and offer your services. Help get out the vote by telephone, doorbell ringing, writing letters.

Vote Intelligently. Many school and local elections are nonpartisan. At general elections you may vote a straight ticket or a split ticket. To do so you will use a secret ballot or voting machine.

If you are disabled or must be out of town, apply for absentee ballot at city or county clerk's office.

Nika Standen

Hot Chicken Bouillon and Tomato Juice Country Salad
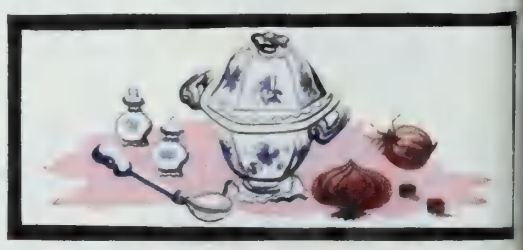
Deep-Dish Apple-Cranberry Pie

No time to cook supper—a man-pleasing Country Salad is in order.

Comes the day when you have no time to cook supper, a nourishing men-and-children-pleasing Country Salad is in order. Half an hour in the morning does it easily.



But remember that with a cold main-dish salad, your family is entitled to a hot beginning to set the gastric juices flowing. Like a cup of steaming soup made from 2 parts clear chicken broth to 1 part tomato juice, with a quick squeeze of lemon juice to zip it up. Heat slowly and thoroughly.

A fine thing, especially for the man of the family, would be to end this meal on another hot note with a deep-dish pie. If he is amenable to suggestions, try an apple-and-cranberry combination, with just a thought of grated orange rind and a next-to-nothing of ground cloves and cinnamon added to the filling, the whole topped by a wrinkle-soothing, thin, flaky crust to mop up the juices. Make your crust in the morning, or the night before, store it in the refrigerator. Have your filling ready, and bake your pie while you're prettying yourself for supper. Serve it with the steam gently rising and a little jug of chilled cream to go along with it, for to watch the cream trickle in with the crimson of the fruit is a pretty sight.

Cut into cubes 4 cold boiled potatoes and 1 (12 ounce) can luncheon meat. Neat cubes, please, for a salad is only as pretty as it is orderly. Next, dice celery not too small to make 1 cupful. Mix potatoes and meat with celery, 1 cup cauliflowerets and ¼ cup chopped walnuts or peanuts. Stir in ¾ cup mayonnaise, ½ teaspoon dry mustard, 1 teaspoon salt, dash of pepper, 3 tablespoons vinegar, ¼ cup light cream and ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce. If you have run out of Worcestershire, a pinch of curry powder will not be amiss. Give the whole a good toss with a fork, but be careful not to break your salad into mushy pieces. Chill until you're ready to serve it. Then, and only then, for crispness' sake, bed it on lettuce leaves, with maybe a few slices of cucumber, a thinly sliced tomato and even thinner onion rings for garnish. And bring on the rye bread and butter to round up the flavors.

French Onion Soup
Bowl of Celery and Water Cress with French Dressing
Cold Cuts
Vanilla Ice Cream or Cold Baked Custard

A great soup that will make men swoon at your feet.

French Onion Soup, a great soup and one that will make men swoon at your feet and bring you mink or candy, according to type. Onion soup can be stirred up in very little time indeed, it's made from stuff that you're bound to have in the house, it's inexpensive. It's not only good, it's soup of blessed memories.

Experience proves that folks don't eat much after a bowl or two of French Onion Soup. So don't let's fuss. A bowl of celery and water cress with French dressing on the side for dunking, a few cold cuts that have been lurking in the refrigerator, a few pickles will be all you need for contentment.

Plain vanilla ice cream, with a simple sauce, if you must, or a nutmeg-flavored custard, with a thin, crisp butter cooky on the side, are my own tried-and-proved suggestions for a perfect ending to this meal.

French Onion Soup (50c)

Melt ½ to ¾ cup butter or margarine, or half and half, in soup pot, taking care not to brown it. Add 1 to 2 pounds onions, which should be sliced into as thin slices as you can make (depending on whether you like a thinner or thicker soup). Cook over low heat, stirring occasionally, until onions are soft and golden and translucent. And don't forget that onions are cussed things, with a tendency to brown and scorch without warning. Now sprinkle 1 to 2 tablespoons flour on the onions, to give the soup a little body. Add 1 quart hot consommé or stock made from 4 bouillon cubes. Stir well, but gently, so as not to break the onion rings. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Simmer quietly for half an hour to an hour.

Serve with fried croutons and grated Parmesan or Italian-type cheese, which is the method I prefer.

Scotch Eggs
Casserole of Celery and Carrots
Lettuce-Grapefruit Salad
Baked Stuffed Pears

Thrifty Scotch Eggs, staying and good as the friendship of Highlanders.

Our main dish today is thrifty Scotch Eggs, staying and good as the friendship of the Highland folk who stayed our hunger with them as we honeymooned on a lonely Scottish moor. Now, twenty years later, Scotch Eggs are still with us, beloved by friends and family alike.

With them we will have celery and carrots in cream-of-mushroom soup, spiced with a whiff of nutmeg, instead of white sauce.

For dessert, have stuffed pears, baked in a medium sugar sirup. Peel the pears thinly, scoop out the cores and fill the hollows with chopped dates or figs or raisins or a mixture of all three. Place in a baking dish, pour the sugar sirup over them, and bake in medium oven until tender, basting occasionally. Chill and serve with top milk or cream.

Scotch Eggs (90c)

Hard-cook 3 eggs and, when cold, peel them. Meantime, season $\frac{1}{2}$ pound hamburger with 1 tablespoon catchup and 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce, or, instead of the latter, with 4 fillets of anchovy chopped fine. Season with $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. All this seasoning may seem excessive, but believe me, it isn't. Taste the meat, and if you think it's too highly seasoned, it will be right. Why? Because you're going to eat a mixture of meat and hard-cooked eggs, than which there is nothing blander. The eggs can't be seasoned, so the hamburger must carry the burden.

Make the hamburger into a thin layer, as if you were rolling out piecrust. Divide into 3 parts, each sufficient to cover an egg. Wrap each egg with meat, and don't let any bald spots peer through. Beat 1 egg slightly. Dip Scotch Eggs into it, and then into bread crumbs. Fry gently in hot fat (enough to reach halfway up the eggs) until nicely browned and crisp on all sides, but be careful—you don't want meat and eggs to divorce each other.

Cut each Scotch Egg in half lengthwise, dish up cut side upward, and serve with a garnish of cut tomatoes or water cress or sprigs of parsley. Since the eggs are on the dry side, you'll want either a tart tomato sauce with them, or a vegetable casserole—one on the thin-sauce side—to supply the necessary moisture.

Fruit Cup
Kidney Hash
Mashed Potatoes and a Green Vegetable
Cottage-Cheese Dessert Soufflé

Unfortunate souls who don't like kidneys will be converts to kidney hash.

Kidney Hash is a good way to convert kidney haters who won't suspect your motive. Mashed potatoes and a plain green vegetable are best with it. String beans, peas, broccoli, any green vegetable that's around.

A fruit cup at the beginning would be good. And for dessert, a cottage-cheese soufflé.

Kidney Hash (81.37)

Trim 2 medium or 3 small beef kidneys (about $1\frac{1}{2}$ pounds) of most of the fat and soak in cold water for about 15 minutes—this is to remove much of the strong flavor. Cook in very little water in a covered

Easy Fish Bake
Potato Nuggets
Limas With Mushrooms
Crustless Apple Pie

Why must our fish stand-bys, like cod and haddock, and the other heartier fish, almost invariably be fried? I bake mine, with a few trimmings. As you'll see, my way is a tasty one of using a food that is nourishing, wholesome and inexpensive.

With fish, simple vegetables are the best. Little nuggets of potatoes. Limas with mushrooms go well with my fish. A small can of mushrooms, or a quarter pound of fresh ones, sliced thin, will do for a package of frozen Limas or two cups of canned Limas. Sauté either kind quickly in a tablespoon of butter or margarine, and mix with your cooked Limas. Season and serve hot.

To end up this dinner, crustless apple pie is an invigorating sort of dessert, and well suited to follow the fish's blandness, especially when the apples are tart.

Easy Fish Bake (77c)

You can make this dish out of any kind of fish, but whereas a pound of fish fillets will feed four people, one one-pound split whole fish might not.

Wash your fish gently, pat it dry with a paper towel. Grease a shallow baking pan, one that's fit to come to the table. Place your fish in it, and dress it with ½ teaspoon salt and a good sprinkle of pepper. Now squeeze with some grated onion. Next, put 2 cups peeled and diced tomatoes on top of the fish. Dot with little pats of butter or margarine, and put your pan under medium broiler heat. Cook until fish will flake slightly, which depends on the kind of fish you're using and the thickness of steak or fillet. It should never be more than 20 minutes. Overcooking fish is one of the easiest things to do. Now put ½ cup grated cheese on the cooked fish and return it to the broiler for the time it will take the cheese to melt. The cheese may seem strange to you, but it does wonders for the taste of the dish.

Crustless Apple Pie

Since apples vary in size, I'm going to ask you to fill a 1½-quart glass baking dish with apples that you've peeled, cored and sliced thin. Don't fill right up to the brim, because you've got to put the delicious topping on it. Again depending on the apples, you may have to add a little water to them. Go easy on it, however, or you'll have applesauce instead of a filling of pie consistency.

Sprinkle the apples with cinnamon and 1 tablespoon grated lemon rind, as well as with the juice of 1 large or 2 small lemons. Of course, if your apples are very tart, you'll need less lemon juice.

Now mix together ½ cup sifted flour, ½ cup brown sugar, ½ cup white sugar, ½ cup butter or margarine and 1 teaspoon salt. I am sorry, but you can't make this delightful goody with one kind of sugar only, so don't be tempted. If you are out of brown sugar, postpone it till the day when you have stocked up again. Mix the ingredients well into as smooth a paste as you know how. Spread over the apples evenly—that's all. And into a hot (425° F.) oven with it, for 40 minutes or until the apples are tender. The sugars, butter and flour will have blended into an infinitely delicious crisp topping. Serve hot or warm. And if you want added glory, serve your Crustless Apple Pie with cinnamon-flecked thin cream, or a little thin custard. Ah-h-h-h!

The "Best Sandwich"
Stewed Tomatoes
Orange, Onion and Apple Salad
Cookies

Looks as if, nowadays, we housewives get most of our exercise keeping the wolf from the door. You think you've outwitted the beast—then you turn around and he stares you in the face from that corner. But if you've got to wolf-dodge, dodge gracefully. After all, what else did our grandmothers do? Their old-fashioned recipes were originally evolved as the best way to keep the wolf in the woods where he belongs.

Dodging the wolf with a few ballet steps rather than a heavy-footed traipse means that you can have food that's interesting and good, though inexpensive. Such as today's main-dish sandwich, as hot and delicious a number for lunch or supper as ever whizzed out of a frying pan.

Our Best Sandwich is a beautifully dry one, and we serve stewed tomatoes with it. For flavor, we like a pinch of orégano flicked in.

The salad may seem an odd one at first glance. Since apples and oranges are fond of each other, and the onion a friend to both, this triangle is a happy one. The proportions are simple: each apple and orange require two slices of a medium sweet onion. Cut the peeled orange crosswise, removing each section of pulp with a sharp-pointed knife. Cut the apple and onion into small pieces, but don't peel the apple. Dress with not-too-tart French dressing, and scatter a whiff of paprika over the whole for looks. Serve in a bowl, surrounded by lettuce leaves.

Since this is a quick meal, let's not spoil it with a slow dessert. Cookies I vote for, with coffee for the grownups and a glass of milk for the young ones.

Best Sandwich ($1.00)

Spread 8 slices of bread with softened butter or margarine. Trim 4 slices boiled ham or 8 thin slices canned luncheon meat to bread size. Then make 4 sandwiches in this order: bread, 1 thin slice Swiss cheese, 1 slice ham or luncheon meat, 1 more slice of cheese, finishing off with a slice of bread, natch. Cut each sandwich in half. Take a fairly heavy skillet and place ¼ cup butter or margarine in it and heat until hot but not brown. Put your sandwiches into it, taking care not to crowd them. Fry them until they are richly golden brown on either side. Serve very hot, on hot plates. THE END

EXTRA FLAVOR—EVEN FOR INEXPENSIVE DISHES!

BinB Mushrooms breathe new life into leftover meats and vegetables—bring out their finest, fullest taste. These tender hothouse beauties are the mushrooms already broiled in pure creamery butter till they're golden brown—then packed in their own delicious, butter-rich broth.

PACKED IN 3 CONVENIENT STYLES!

WHOLE CROWNS for mouth-melting goodness on steaks, chops, meat patties.
SLICED MUSHROOMS for new taste-appeal in leftovers, chicken à la king and other casserole dishes.
CHOPPED MUSHROOMS for extra flavor in spaghetti sauce, meat loaf, soups and gravies.

As for Crimson Velvet, she had read it a year before, when it had been produced in London. Or rather, Angela read it to her, and at the end Miss Lovelace said, "You pipe it, Angela. You pipe it and gasp it, when it should boom, like the sea. Like this." And after demonstrating she said, "There is only one actress in America to play it." Meaning, of course, herself.

The simple truth was that she craved this part as she had not craved a part in twenty years. It was what Juliet had been to her when she was younger, or Lady Macbeth somewhat later—or what King Lear would be to her now, if she were a man.

But this was not the only reason she said to Angela now, "He seems well disposed, does he?"

"Oh, yes, very."

"Good." She patted Angela's sleeve. "Perhaps we'll be able to buy you a new dress." She smiled, as she thought that the poor little wraith would be sure to choose something gray and fashionless, that would hang on her frame like an old stretched sweater. She always had.

But Angela waved the suggestion away. "Oh, Miss Lovelace, dear, you're not to worry about that. There are other things," and her glance stole to the escritoire in the corner where the bills and the letters of gentle but unmistakable pressure were piled.

"I haven't forgotten," said Miss Lovelace.

But, of course, none of this could she tell Mr. Marshall. His invitation had made her understand very clearly the kind of evening he wanted it to be—entirely and falsely social, with mention of Crimson Velvet avoided as though neither of them had ever heard of it. Orchids, dinner, the theater; bright superficial conversation—and watchful eyes above his gentlemanly smile, while he looked her over and asked himself, Is she too old? Is she in full possession of her faculties? Can she still get around?

Of course there were moments when Miss Lovelace resented this impending inspection; even moments of arrogance, when she reminded herself that not since her second year in the theater had she submitted to a tryout or an audition. From then on, it had never been a question of "Could she?"—but only and always, "Would she?"

But these were no longer the days of success; and the pride that clings to privilege, she knew, could turn into a boomerang. Moreover, she had the truer pride of utter self-assurance. She would show him. In a hundred different oblique ways, she would show him tonight that she was the actress for Crimson Velvet.

She rose, saying, "I've kept him waiting long enough."

"Oh, Miss Lovelace," said Angela, retreating a step, "you look beautiful!"

"Thank you. I hope he thinks so."

She breathed once deeply, swept the ermine coat with its shiny-ribboned orchids from the bed, took the little evening bag from Angela's hands and started for the door. But on a second thought she stopped. One of the ways to show him had just occurred to her.

"Where are my glasses, Angela?"

"Why, in your bag, Miss Lovelace. I never forget them."

"Take them out."

"Out!"

"I shall leave them behind."

Angela gasped, and Miss Lovelace could feel, rather than see, how shocked she was—as though she were saying, "It's quite proper for you to be without your glasses when I'm there, but alone!" And of course she was right. Angela had been her eyes these many years. Without her glasses Miss Lovelace could see a blur; even with them she saw precious little.

"I know, I know, dear Angela," she said. "But tonight I shan't use them."

Angela, looking like a frightened mouse, obeyed. Miss Lovelace turned in the door way then and smiled at her.

"After all," she whispered, "we don't want him to think that I'm an old lady, do we?"

In the other room, Vincent Marshall, looking rather like a prosperous young banker with his smooth light hair and conservative dinner jacket, was standing before the mantelpiece, thoughtfully gazing up at the portrait by Augustus John of Jessica Lovelace as a long-ago Rosalind.

The green parrot, from its perch on the fire screen, had been scrutinizing him askance with bright malignant eyes. Now it fractured the silence with a yawp that made him jump a little and wheel around. On the bare floor of the vestibule outside there was a scuttle of dachshunds, which turned into a patter like sudden heavy rain as they reached the carpet and rushed toward him self-importantly. He saw that they were outriders for Miss Jessica Lovelace herself, who now advanced to meet him, erect and smiling.

He all but stood at attention. Though he was here to inspect her as she had guessed and though he had earned a reputation as one of the most brilliant and ruthless of the newer producers, he was basically a stage-struck young man, who was sentimental about the theatrical past he had not known. Accordingly, he loved old actresses almost as dearly as he loved young ones.

"This is a pleasure, Miss Lovelace," he said, and she replied with hand outstretched:

"What beautiful orchids—and how charming of you to bring them to me, Mr. Vincent."

He corrected her with a smile. "Mr. Marshall."

But the bland way in which she said, "Of course—Mr. Marshall," made it sound as though she were forgiving him gently for an error of his own.

He was not altogether surprised to find that the sheer massive magnificence of her presence had made his heart begin to pound. She stood before him in cloth of silver—slightly tarnished, but that was no matter—with a filigree of garnets at her throat. Grotesque and sibylline and strangely beautiful, she was seventy if she was a day. She had blue-black hair, and thick paint glistened on her mobile lips. She might even have looked a little evil, he thought, but for her heavy eyes, which seemed through long gazing at sorrow to be no longer capable of astonishment, and her dauntless manner which said in effect, "The only sin is loss of hope."

"Would you like a cocktail?" she asked as she enthroned herself by the fireplace.

"Would you?"

"I allow myself only one," she said, "and I shall have it at dinner."

If this was true, it answered a question he could not directly ask. Drunkenness was not unknown among these divinities.

"Then I'll wait, too," he said.

But this she would not allow, and calling "Angela!" intoned his order in the sombre contralto that had stirred the English-speaking world for two generations.

He thought of the history—romantic as well as theatrical—which she had made decades before he was born. It had all con to him down the years, in rumors and legends, out of old reminiscences and patched clippings: the poor young composer who had won her by the heartbreaking beauty of his love songs; the statesman who had sacrificed his career for her; the secret tunnel to her house from the palace of a prince. This very room he sat in now was a museum of her long, triumphant story.

But she parried charmingly all his attempts to induce her to talk of the past. She seemed at pains to make it clear that she was of the present too. She hated to prattle of her memories; she went to all the new plays and to concerts and opera, and she talked with relish of driving fast, and flying, and radio, and even television.

Then, stroking the parrot's green head with her forefinger, she told Vincent Marshall the story of its life—a conversation piece, he realized, that had become automatic through many repetitions.

"Poor Poppy," she said, in a kind of imperial baby talk, "he comes from deep in the Amazon jungles, and now he leads a lonesome life because we haven't been able to find him a lady friend. Have we?"

"No," said the bird, distinctly—dolefully. And Miss Lovelace sat back, beaming.

Then Angela tiptoed in with the cocktail on a silver tray. Marshall raised his glass to Miss Lovelace, inclining his head. It was a mere automatic ceremony, but she acknowledged it with such a unique and grateful smile that, quite suddenly, it had become a tribute of deference and even of affection.

It took an effort of the will to remind himself of his purpose here, and even then his first thought was, How perfect she'll be in Crimson Velvet! He had said to the author the day he signed the contract, "You've written a virtual impossibility, you know . . . this combination of great lady and water-front bawd—majestic, earthy, strident and tragic, all in one old woman. She has to be one of those dominating, larger-than-life personalities, and they don't happen in these days of microphones and close-ups. In fact, the pattern was thrown away years ago."

Unless people are on a very intimate footing they should never say things that are true; there is always a splendid selection of untrue remarks to be made.

—L. DOUGALL

Together, on the fingers of one hand, they had ticked off the actresses who fitted this description, and found them all dead or in Hollywood. All but Jessica Lovelace—and when Marshall mentioned her, they just looked at each other in sudden, excited silence. At last the author shook his head.

"I see what you mean—she'd be wonderful," he told Marshall. "Just what I wrote. But can she? She's been in retirement for years. Can she still get around? Can she remember lines?"

It was the answer to these questions that Marshall was here to seek. The pitfalls, he knew, were legion. Whoever finally played Crimson Velvet would be on the stage—and at the center of it—for all but ten minutes of each performance. She would make her first entrance down a long flight of steps. She would have to be as sensitive as a violin and as strong as a dray horse.

And from past experience with elderly actors, Marshall knew that Miss Lovelace, if he engaged her, might very well start rehearsals with gusto and authority, only to prove unequal to the task too late. He tried to imagine her descending the stairs, rising, sitting, moving about, and wondered if she would become overtired, hysterical, or actually ill. And then he thought of the script, black with long speeches. Could she learn them and retain them, or would she play the opening night giving antiphonal responses to an all-too-audible prompter?

He asked himself how he could ever be sure. He hoped against doubt that she would pass muster, but he knew that it would not be to her discredit if the decision went against her.

He put down his glass and looked at his watch.

"Is it time?" she asked.

He hurried forward to help her rise, but she said "Thank you," and, using her arms only a little for leverage, rose beautifully by herself.

She flashed him a smile. "Shall we go?"

"Yes, let's."

He draped the ermine wrap around her shoulders. She patted the orchids, said "How really gala!" then turned to the parrot and the dogs. "Now good night, children!" she cried. "Behave yourselves, do you hear?"

By a quarter to ten that night, as the gay first act of the new musical drew to a close, Vincent Marshall had come festively to a great decision. He had been watching Miss Lovelace closely. He had noted the vitality that never waned; he had observed the way she got into and out of taxis; and he had listened to the flow of her conversation, increasingly beguiled. It was true that the question of her memory remained unanswered, but she had slipped only once, at the beginning of the evening when she had confused his first name with his last, and that could hardly be held against her. In any case, now he had concluded that his search was over. He would offer her the stellar role in Crimson Velvet.

It was on the tip of his tongue to speak of it as they moved up the crowded aisle for an intermission cigarette. He knew how pleased she would be; and this made him additionally fond of her, as the warmth of imminent charity expanded inside him. But he was delayed for a moment by greeting an acquaintance, and when he looked around, Miss Lovelace was no longer at his side. The slow momentum of her majestic progress had carried her ahead, just out of earshot.

Miss Lovelace herself was unaware of this separation. She sailed on up the aisle, with the habitual, imperial tilt to her head, automatically obeying the instruction an old actor had given her fifty years before—"Never look down at your feet, my dear. It spoils the line." And the crowd, unconscious of its own obeisance, made way for her, as it always had, like river craft before a liner. By the time she reached the front of the theater, she was ahead and alone, with Vincent Marshall in her wake, close behind.

She knew she had made a success with him, and suspected he was about to offer her the part, so in the grandeur of her advance there was a certain gaiety, too, which raised her chin still higher and made her perhaps a trifle careless.

But in the end it was her vanity that undid her. Her eyes sparkled, but she had left her glasses home. And now, as she approached the doorway with its curtains pulled back, she could not read—and did not even see—the warning sign that said "Lounge—One Flight Below." She neither stumbled nor tripped. No one pushed her. She just stepped off into air and fell headlong.

Vincent Marshall heard a scream that froze his blood, and saw her clutch for support that was not there as she swooped out of sight like an ungainly silver bird. In two strides he reached the top of the steps and looked down. She lay, a toppled statue, on the landing halfway below—disheveled, prone and motionless.

For an instant horror paralyzed him. Then, shouting "Get the house doctor!" he plunged down the stairs, while the thought that he was to blame for this overwhelmed him. She was ancient and brittle, and he should have looked after her better. He felt like a careless grandson who has shirked his responsibility. On the landing he leaned over her, calling "Miss Lovelace—Miss Lovelace—are you badly hurt? Can you tell me?" But she did not answer.

Automatically he reached for her wrist and exhaled with relief when he felt her pulse. Helpful superfluous people crowded the stairs above him, asking what they could do or get. And in this very moment of panic, as

He crouched there uncertain if she would ever walk again, he realized, with a sense of shock at his own callousness, that he had changed his mind about offering her the part in Crimson Velvet. The decision had come sudden and complete, buttressed with unanswerable reasons. It would be fatal to depend on an equilibrium so precarious. If her eyes were so bad and her footing so unsure, then her memory was doubtless dim as well. He looked down at her in sorrow and pity, but he knew it could not be helped. He had found out what he had come to learn.

He did not know it, but Miss Lovelace was conscious. She heard him calling her name again and asking if the house doctor had come yet; she heard the people on the stairs exchanging whispered theories as to how the accident had happened and who she was. But still she did not answer. She was afraid that if she opened her mouth she would cry. Not in pain, though there was enough of that; she would cry in anger and desolation because she had lost forever the chance to be a star again.

The words Too old . . . too old, on the hundred tongues of her own despair, pounded in her ear. But she had always been impatient of despair, and soon she began to think that it was self-indulgence to lie here, that she was making a scene and causing trouble, and that, after all, there was nothing serious the matter with her. Finally, the same vanity that had caused her to fall now goaded her to rise. "This position is ridiculous," she said. "Help me up."

"Miss Lovelace, dear," said Angela a few hours later, pausing at the bedroom door, "I just wanted you to know . . . I'm going to pray tonight."

Aching in bed, Miss Lovelace merely nodded gratefully. But a moment afterward, when Angela had turned off the light and closed the door, she said to herself aloud, with some surprise, "Why, so, I think, shall I."

But praying appeared to have no effect whatever. She felt dreadful the next morning, even though her own physician, summoned late the night before, had confirmed the house doctor's diagnosis. "Miraculously unhurt," he had said. "A little bruised and shaken up, but just stay in bed for a week and you'll feel as good as new."

It was true that flowers arrived from Vincent Marshall in the afternoon; but when Angela began to speculate as to what this gesture might mean, Miss Lovelace interrupted her. "It means he has good manners and a sweet nature, and nothing else at all," she said.

LAST night when he had brought her home from the theater his solicitude had been touching. He had delivered her anxiously to Angela's care, and would have waited for the doctor to arrive if Miss Lovelace had not managed to dissuade him by her repeated lie that she felt wonderful, really wonderful. Finally, departing, he had asked if he might telephone her soon. And even as she smiled and said, "Yes, do," Miss Lovelace had been sure that he had no intention of ever telephoning her again.

"He's a gentleman," she said now, "but about the play, his mind is made up."

She seemed to be right. Ten days later Angela brought in a newspaper with Miss Lovelace's breakfast tray, and read aloud a list of the celebrities who had been seen at a recent theatrical ball.

"Vincent Marshall," she read, in the tone one naming a traitor, "with the distinguished star of twenty years ago, Ida Gray ——"

Up to this point, Miss Lovelace had not begun to feel in the least new, in spite of the prophecies of the doctors. Now, however, she tossed back the covers and got out of bed.

"The young man's a fool!" she snorted. "Ida Gray was never a star, and it's preposterous of her to pretend she was."

She swept back and forth in her negligee like an angry empress. "A pleasant-enough woman with a pretty little talent," she went on. "But she lacks stature. She lacks magnificence." And then, the final condemnation—"She displaces no air when she enters a room!"

Suddenly she said, "Angela, dial Eileen Shively for me."

WHEN Angela had reached the agent, Miss Lovelace took the telephone and spoke of inconsequential matters. At last she said, "What a charming young man Mr. Marshall is!" And waited.

"Oh, he's so upset," the agent answered, after a pause. "He wanted you so badly for the play ——"

"The play? I thought that was all forgotten."

"Frankly, he keeps looking at other women, and then comes back to you."

Miss Lovelace smiled. So much for Ida Gray and the part in Crimson Velvet.

"But he's worried," Eileen Shively went on "I can't find out exactly why—something about —" She hesitated.

"Yes, Eileen?"

"Well—he told me about your fall." And then, on cue, solicitude oozed over the wire. "By the way, dear, are you all right?"

"Of course I'm all right. He saw that I was all right."

"But he told me there was a sign there. He—he decided your sight might make it difficult for you ——"

"My sight?" Miss Lovelace boomed and reached for her glasses. "What do you mean?"

Eileen Shively rushed on. "The entrance in the play is down a flight of stairs, you know. And then there's the reading at rehearsals, and all that. He thought it might be too taxing."

"I wonder how he ever got such an idea," Miss Lovelace said, and hung up. Then, avoiding Angela's wide anxious eyes, she said quietly, "It was only a play, after all—and it was simply not to be. We must resign ourselves."

"Yes, Miss Lovelace," whispered Angela obediently.

But for Miss Lovelace, even though she had suggested it, the habit of lowering her flag was hard to come by. She had always thought that resignation was merely a cheerful synonym for defeat; the end of all hope, really.

Suddenly she straightened her back and raised her chin in rejection.

"Angela," she said grimly, "light me a cigarette."

Now she waved the dachshunds away when they clamored for her lap. She refused to answer, or even notice, the wheedling cacophonies of the parrot. She took long, thoughtful inhalations on the cigarette, and Angela, watchful, moved silently around the apartment. She had seen Miss Lovelace like this before. She would brood for several hours, utterly still, looking more like a seeress than ever; and it would be impossible to know what she was thinking, or working out, or planning.

Hours later, Angela heard her name called.

"Yes, Miss Lovelace?" She put her head in at the door.

Miss Lovelace was not looking at her. She was sitting forward, leaning with her elbow on her knees, tapping a rolled newspaper against the palm of her hand.

"Angela," she said, and her voice was very deep, "we shall be fantastic and audacious. Get me Mr. Marshall on the telephone."

Somewhat warily, two days later, Vincent Marshall appeared at Miss Lovelace's apartment for tea. He was sure it would be an embarrassing and difficult couple of hours, and he had not really wanted to come at all. But neither did he want to hurt her feelings, and he was curious about just why she wished to see him.

At least, he thought, there would no longer be a point at issue between them, because he had very nearly decided to abandon his production of Crimson Velvet. That morning he had said to the author, "It's a beautiful play, but you wrote it ten years too late for the only actress who could have played it."

But when the only actress greeted him, arrayed this afternoon in a topaz satin tea gown with fur bands around the drooping sleeves, he was immediately beguiled again.

"How delightful to see you, dear Mr. Marshall," she said, and he felt as though she had knighted him.

"Are you all recovered now?" he asked.

She belittled the question with a shrug. "Oh, it was nothing. The very next day I felt splendid." She smiled. "You know, stairs mean nothing to me. And I must have been in that theater a hundred times, so I knew very well those steps were there. Just at that moment, though, they slipped my mind."

Exactly, he thought. They had slipped her mind. Just as his own name had slipped her mind, at the very moment when she was first greeting him. Just as whole speeches and stage business and entrance cues would have slipped her mind on an opening night, and later. He had known that it was not a question of the stairs on the set—they could easily have been changed. But he had been right to worry about her memory, right to dismiss her from his plans.

But this, he found as she led him into the drawing room, in no way altered the peculiar potency of her effect on him, or the reverence, even the fondness, of his feeling for her—half gallantry, half nostalgia, pervaded with a sense of pity because she was no longer what she had been.

She gestured him into a chair, and as she seated herself he watched her arrange the satin folds of her tea gown, with all the appearance of accident, for their best effect.

Looking around him, he observed gratefully that the dachshunds had been banished. The parrot sat as usual, brilliant and baleful, on the fire screen; but there was something hushed about the room this afternoon that even the parrot did not violate—a sense of being in a quiet refuge, outside of time, outside the pressures of ambition and struggle.

MISS LOVELACE, facing him over the elaborate silver of the tea service, was composed, charming and smilingly unhurried. There was clearly nothing special on her mind. And as he sat there, Vincent Marshall, little by little, put aside the wariness with which he had arrived. It was engulfed in her relaxation; and at last he relaxed, too, concluding with some astonishment that she had asked him here only for his company, with no ulterior motive whatever.

Last time he had observed her unwillingness to talk of the past, so now he was careful to ask her no direct questions about it, much as he wanted to. But as he finished his first cup of tea, he was delighted to discover that quite without prompting she was talking freely of her youth and middle years—being reminded of one name by another, rambling easily up and down the corridors of time, from Shakespeare to Bernard Shaw, from David Garrick to Booth and Sothern and finally the Barrymore "boys." These and other shining presences she evoked in the muted room by the casual, familiar, almost affectionate way she mentioned them.

And somehow they all seemed contemporaries of one another as well as of herself. But of those who were still alive she was for the most part discreetly vague. Marshall could not tell which had been only acquaintances, and which ones friends or even lovers. Sometimes, however, in connection with men who had long since died, she allowed herself to be more explicit. Then a transitory smile would soften her features, as though a remembered witticism had flitted into her mind and out again. She lowered her eyes, entirely without coquetry, and said softly, of this one or that one, "I was engaged to him for three years."

SHE mentioned a young hero of the Boer War who had returned to London just as she was completing her first season there as a star. "There was a lovely article about him in last month's Athenaeum," she said. "Did you happen to see it?"

"No," said Marshall. "I don't often read the English monthlies."

After a small search she found the magazine in the rack next to her chair, then hesitated. "I don't want to bore you."

"No danger," he assured her.

She held the magazine well away and, narrowing her eyes a little, began to read, easily and quietly. Once or twice she looked up at him with an interrogative sort of smile, as if to say, "Am I still not boring you?" And of course she was not, though after a while the young military hero began to settle into a middle age of rather monotonous distinction, and only one early sentence had mentioned her: "At this time, he vied with all the most brilliant in the world of society and the arts in the adulation of the beautiful young American actress, Jessica Lovelace, who was perhaps more frequently to be seen escorted by him than any other."

Religion is not something foreign, not something superadded to the fundamental nature of the soul. It has to do rather with the whole process of self-development and with the building of those ideals by which we live. —RUFUS M. JONES: Finding the Trail of Life (The Macmillan Company, 1950).

But Vincent Marshall found that it did not really matter what she read; even the list of all the Empire's honors which had been conferred upon this dazzling suitor of hers became something of a song, because of the sheer deep enchantment of her voice.

He listened, too, in amazement. Because now after she had turned over several pages, it had dawned on him at last. He leaned forward and stared at her. There she sat, without glasses, reading!

Miss Lovelace was aware of his sudden shift of position. She did not look up again, but her voice swelled, louder and richer. She had come to the fourth page now. She must be careful not to let the pounding of her heart become audible in her voice. She must remember to hold the magazine at arm's length, for verisimilitude, and to pucker her eyes and move them back and forth like a typewriter carriage. With her free hand she pushed herself out of the chair, and all the time her voice rolled on.

Now she was standing by the mantelpiece where she could hear the parrot rustling its way closer to her along the fire screen. Mr. Marshall had risen, too, and she could tell by his listening silence that he was all but not breathing.

She finished the article. She looked at him and saw his smile, from which astonishment had not quite vanished. Yes, he was convinced. Success had so clearly rewarded her bold and subtle strategy that this was where she should have stopped, leaving well enough alone. But now in the flush of victory she overplayed her hand.

As acting, it was as brilliant as all that had gone before. She put the magazine down. She said, "Another cup of tea?" and when he thanked her and refused, she moved casually from table to table, turning on the lamps to make the room glow goldenly. She maneuvered it so she was back where she had started and could appear to pick up the magazine again as an afterthought. She could not resist this last satisfaction of her triumph this final vindication of her eyesight. She had to show him how small the type was.

Slip of Paper

CLAIRE BRYANT managed to look quite composed as she finally walked into the reception room. She had stood outside for a full minute, studying with great satisfaction the name on the door: Burton & Bryant, Attorneys-at-Law.

Suddenly the door at the left swung open, and a tall young man with a big grin filled the doorway.

"Hello, Mom!"

Together they walked into his office with its view of the tall buildings, the river, and the harbor out beyond. She looked and approved, then looked again and approved some more. She sat in the deep leather chair by the window and smiled back at her boy.

"Jack," she said, "for years people have been warning me not to dote on you too much. I took their advice seriously. I have tried hard not to spoil you. But today I'm bound to say I'm proud as a peacock of you—and as satisfied with myself and with life as I can be!"

"I'm happy, too, Mom. It was wonderful of Mr. Burton to take me in as a partner so soon. By the way—I've had Dad's big walnut desk moved up here. It fits in swell!"

"I noticed that," said Claire Bryant. "I wish he could see you now."

The young man grinned that nice, slow grin of his. "Just before you came in," he said, "I found something in the top drawer of the desk." He pulled a fragile, time-yellowed piece of paper out of his pocket. "That's Dad's writing, all right. But what the deuce does it mean?"

Claire took the piece of paper. Her face softened as she looked at it. "Yes . . . it's his writing. He was always writing himself notes in a sort of private shorthand he had. Can't you figure out what it means?"

The young man read the note again. "6-7-23—see R. W. re more ins."

"Who is R. W.?" he asked.

"That gives it away," she smiled. "R. W. is Robert Wilson . . ."

"You mean the agent who took care of Dad's insurance?"

"That's right—he was with the New York Life. Notice the date . . ."

"Six-seven-twenty-three—June seventh, 1923—why, that's the day I was born!"

His mother smiled. "Your father had a thousand plans for you. And being a lawyer, he never liked to put things off." She looked at the note again. "You see, your father got hold of Robert Wilson, whose advice he respected, and took out more insurance. That's why when your father died, everything—including your law education—was provided for."

The grin again relieved the serious expression on the young man's face, "I suppose you don't frame a thing like this," he mused, looking at the piece of paper. He dropped it into the top drawer of the old walnut desk. "But I guess I'll keep it here handy—to remind me how I got off to a wonderful start . . . yes, before I even knew it!"

But the expected acquiescence did not ne immediately. Instead there was a small npathetic way—gently, quizzically. He k the magazine from her, turned it right up, and put it back in her hands.

"Yes, very handsome," he said, sounding m and amused. "Particularly when he's he peered down at the blur she was holdthen, horrified, understood. Putting the gazine down with a slap, she turned away kly to hide her face.

Don't be upset," he said.
He was being too gentle, making her feel netic, and she hated that. She thought of story he could tell, and the guffaws that ld accompany it. Closing her eyes, she yed a little in humiliation. Go away, she ght. Please, please, go away.
I expect you're very busy," she said in a nesslike tone, with her face still averted.
"I mustn't keep you. Thank you for coming to see me again."

"Miss Lovelace," he said softly, "you recited that whole article without stumbling once. Your memory must be prodigious!"

With a desolate laugh she turned to face him. "My dear young man, I have been on the stage for fifty-two years, and I have never stumbled in all that time!"

He crossed the room quickly and led her back to her chair. "Please," he said, "I've got to talk to you. I've just bought a play that has a most magnificent part for you. It's called Crimson Velvet."

It was the first time that name had been spoken aloud, and she had to force control on the muscles of her face. If she let go now, she would laugh like a fool—she could feel the laughter rising in her throat. Or was it tears—or both? She permitted herself only a fleeting exultant thought or two: the new dress she would buy for Angela, the theater marquee twinkling her name toward Broadway once again, the critics writing "Miss Jessica Lovelace returned to grace the New York stage last night. . . ."

It was not the years of the past that counted after all, she thought. It was now, and what was to come.

"Crimson Velvet?" she said, and her voice was very serene and quiet. "What an intriguing title. Do tell me all about it."

herefore, they do not release for society nique power which is in them.
Instead of supplementing and modifying asculine experience and urge, they be-rivals and emulators, pleased as peacocks if anyone tells them that they "have the brains of a man"—as though the brain were detachable from the whole physical and emotional apparatus, from biological and psychological functions. Their biological function is not masculine, their sexuality is not masculine, and their social function, which cannot be divorced from these, is also not masculine.

But they are afraid to express their instinct: to express, for instance, in immense power, their implacable opposition to war—even when war, for propaganda purposes, comes disguised as "peace." They are afraid to express it precisely because it is natural, maternal and instinctive, and therefore—they warn themselves—inferior. They fall in with the notion of peace as punishment, though the role of women, even in the family, is not that of punisher but of intercessor.

Saying this is in part a confession, in part an analysis of myself, and therefore, perhaps, of no generalizable value.

But I think that I am a quite representative woman of my times. I find myself now, in my late middle age, re-evaluating—and regretting—many attitudes I have taken against my instincts. As I look back on my life and work, furthermore, I find that events have proved me oftenest right when I permitted myself to follow immediate, powerful and thoroughly feminine "hunches," and then submit them, of course, to intellectual analysis. Such hunches have even been found eventually to have the sounder basis in logic. For we all know a great deal more than we are able to think; experiences and observations unrecorded in the catalogue system of the brain are being made continually. The poets and the mystics, who are able to draw upon that vast reservoir of unconscious knowledge, are always the best judges. For they judge, as Walt Whitman said, "not as the lawyer judges, but as light judges, falling around a helpless thing." And it was this same poet who, in his testament to Americans, advised them to "spend much time with the mothers of small children." Women will, I think, have fulfilled the woman's revolution when they are not only equal in external status, but when they dare to be equal in real power—in the power generated in their wombs, their nerves, their maternal experiences, and not only in their heads. Then they will contribute to bring humanity into equilibrium, which is harmony, and peace.

TOO YOUNG TO MARRY

a continual series of personal crises. Yet her charm is not even suggestive of the withered and grasping shrew which desire is supposed to breed. On the contrary, she is young-looking for a woman of fifty. Her brown hair is only slightly gray; she has a very straight nose, and gray eyes which are lively enough to remind you of a pair of elves dancing together.

Elsie is often as gay as her elfish eyes. She has a lovable, ridiculous sense of humor. When she is tired, she laughs uproariously; if she could draw, she would be in demand as a cartoonist, for she is expert at exaggerating people's habits to make them seem absurd.

One hot afternoon I returned from the hospital to find my mother on the living-room sofa, laughing until the tears rolled down her cheeks. Elsie was standing in the middle of the room. Her gray eyes were screwed up to look small and bright. One lock of gray-brown hair was hung over her forehead, and her mouth was pulled down into a sad, querulous droop. Elsie hunched up her back and took faltering steps to the nearest chair, into which she dropped her weight, in the manner of old people. Then she said "Aah" in a quavering, masculine voice. She looked at my mother and said vindictively, "Young lady, I always worked for my living. Let me tell you that. If young people nowadays would work like I did, they wouldn't always be trying to borrow money from me." The smile under Elsie's characterization burst upon her face. She joined mother in hearty laughter.

"Uncle Roger to a T!" cried my mother.

When I saw such nonsense, I thought, How wonderful to have Elsie in the house! It was wonderful, too, for another reason. Aunt Elsie could play the piano with the true, delicate touch of a real artist. Every day we were treated to the beauty of her music, which came from the keys with perfect timing and rich sweetness. Usually she would sit down at the piano and play through a half dozen of the pieces she knew.

BUT one day when I came home from the hospital I heard her playing something with which I was not familiar. It was a short passage—a trill and a run breaking into a vigorous waltz—and she played it over and over, changing it a little with each rendition. I came into the living room and found Elsie bending over the piano, making notes on a piece of music paper. She was leaning over the paper in such absorbed concentration that she did not hear me enter. Her striped cotton dress was wrinkled and opened at the neck with unusual casualness. As she wrote, her left hand kept pushing back from her forehead little damp strands of hair. She had evidently been hard at work a long time. Now she stuck her pencil between her teeth and looked thoughtfully into space.

"Why, hello there," she said suddenly.

I stood transfixed with curiosity. "What are you doing?"

Aunt Elsie's thin-chiseled lips broadened into a happy smile. "I'm having the best time!" she announced exuberantly. "I'm writing a sonata. I've been at it since early this morning, and I'm going to work at it until it's good. Then I'm going to get it published."

She looked down again at the piano and began to play over the same run in waltz tune. She had already forgotten all about me, and she was frowning meditatively. Stunned by her announcement, I went upstairs to put away my uniform, the gay waltz following me into my room. Elsie had never before composed one line of music! Now I found her creating a sonata with an interest worthy of Chopin or Brahms.

I WAS more surprised than I should have been. I have since learned that Elsie never does anything without doing it intensely. If she cares about a thing at all, it matters very much to her, at least for the moment. This is a quality she inherited from her mother's family, the Scribners. Mary Scribner, true to family tradition, used to try very hard to do everything well. After she married Grandfather Sturges he adopted a pet rer for her benefit. He would smile at her and say, as if it were a new thought, "You k the reason you're different is that everyt matters so muc you."

"I'll never forget wh gave me my diploma. He shook my and said, right out before everyone, Sturges, you have a record to be pro You have received the best grades ever at the Juilliard School of Music.'"

There was a slight silence while we flected upon the glory of that occasion. Lu asked her mother, "What made yo cide so suddenly to start writing musi and feel better FAST!

At the First Sign of a COLD

Take 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets with a full glass of water...

HERE'S ADVICE about colds that we think your own doctor will tell you is sound and effective.

No matter how you try to stop or shorten a cold, the first thing to do—before you do anything else—is to take Bayer Aspirin.

You should do this because a cold is almost invariably accompanied by muscular aches and pains—and a headachy, feverish feeling. And for your own good, you need a medication that will relieve these distressing symptoms—relieve them quickly.

The reason Bayer Aspirin tablets bring you this relief is that they start disintegrating in two seconds—by stopwatch. This means that they're ready to go to work almost instantly.

This Bayer way of feeling better fast—tested and proved by millions—is now being used by more men, women and children than ever before.

So don't experiment with a cold. Use genuine Bayer Aspirin. And always be sure to ask for it by the name "Bayer" when you buy.

Because no other pain reliever can match its record of use by millions of normal people without ill effect, one thing you can take with complete confidence is genuine jubilance, and her brow contracted into a frown. I suspected she was thinking of the handsome man she had married and comparing him with the person who was now her husband, the person whose good looks had disappeared along with his hair and with the advent of wrinkles and a gold tooth. "If your father weren't quite so easygoing ——" Aunt Elsie told Lu, her voice sad and plaintive. "He won't even listen to my ideas. I've told him I want to move to Florida!"

Poor, charming Uncle Richmond, I thought. His sincere, unhurried manner has won him firm friends. Long ago, soon after he began work in Hillside, people started to call him by the fond nickname, "Cap," because, as the boy who helped him at the store said, "You look like nothin' ever bothers you. You're captain of the situation!" Yet the same unhurried manner that had won Richmond friends had lost him his wife. Elsie calls his idea that the world was made for relaxation and enjoyment a lack of ambition. And now, after being married to him for twenty-four years, she decides to stifle her misery by composing music.

From our places in the dining room we felt a sharp, cool summer breeze start up and sweep in the open door from the back terrace. Mother glanced out the window at the dark clouds gathering over the peonies in the back yard. "H'm, a summer shower!" she said. All at once we heard a great, swooshing sound from the living room, and the sound of papers being carried abreast of a strong wind. Then came soft, clopping sounds as the papers landed on the floor and the furniture about the room. I heard our Scotty bark out short, staccato, gleeful sounds, and the patter of his feet jumping about.

"My music!" cried Aunt Elsie. Clutching her napkin, she rose from her chair and hurried into the living room.

> It is difficult not to exaggerate the happiness which one is not enjoying.
> —STENDHAL.

We all followed her, and there we found pandemonium supreme. Sheet music was scattered in pieces all around the living room and even in the front hall—beneath the piano, on father's pipe rack, on top of the music stand and all over the middle of the floor. We saw Mickey's furry little black figure racing around in circles of delight in the excitement. His wagging tail was a dark blur of happiness. In his mouth he held two large sheets of music. They were the papers with Elsie's notes upon them!

Aunt Elsie lunged at Mickey and shouted frantically, "Drop it, Mickey, drop it!"

But Mickey's bounding around the room only became more ecstatic. He pretended that the papers were an animal at which he was very angry. Dropping the papers for a minute, he would eye them and growl. Then, just as Elsie darted forward to rescue them, he would snatch them up and race to the other side of the room. Finally he realized that Aunt Elsie did not want to play. With a puzzled look on his little black face, he laid down the papers for good and slunk away, subdued. But the music paper he left behind was in shreds. The soft-penciled notes over which Elsie had labored were blurred and unreadable, and the sheets were gashed and ripped from corner to corner.

ELSIE knelt by the wreckage with the air of a first-aider at an emergency accident. There was a shot of silence as she examined the music. Then she cried out, "My work! A whole day's work ruined by that dog!" She stood up, holding out the mangled papers for our examination. Her cheeks were flushed. "Look, just look at this mess!"

Lu said quietly, "I guess you'll just have to do it over again."

"Over again!" cried Elsie. "As if I could ever again get it the same way I had it this afternoon. Why, it was practically perfect." She collapsed on the sofa behind her. "I might as well give up right now and scrap the whole thing," she said.

Mother had begun to pick up the music scattered in odd places about the room. When she heard Elsie's last remark, she stopped and said, "I wouldn't do that, Elsie. It sounded very well this afternoon. Any music that's worth bothering about is worth more than a day's work."

"But there's no use my going on," Elsie moaned. "Nobody cares about what I do. I struggle to get along, and I get no help at all. Something's always bound to destroy my work. It's just fate, that's all!" She flung herself out of the sofa and said, "I'm going upstairs and lie down. I don't feel well."

As Aunt Elsie went up to her room, even the petulant way she lifted her feet expressed her angry mood.

I COULD not help but think of her cousin, Hamilton Scribner. When I was fourteen, mother and father took me with them on a trip East. On our way through Cambridge we stopped to visit Ham at Harvard, where he was in college. When we came upon him in his apartment, he was slouched in an old chair, intent on reading the works of Robert Herrick. To my idealizing eyes he appeared very handsome, tall and lean with azure eyes. I saw him only once, but I shall always remember him slouched in his muddy-colored chair, reading, an iced drink in his right hand. I shall always remember that he would not say one word to me. When we left him that afternoon, I was near to tears because he had not noticed me. Mother consoled me by confiding that Ham was a little eccentric. He was a person of moods: very quiet some of the time, and brilliantly gay the rest. Two months later he was elected to Phi Beta Kappa, and the week after he received his key we heard the news of his death: he killed himself by deliberately walking into the path of a mammoth bus.

I think no one ever told Aunt Elsie how much she is like Hamilton.

Fifteen minutes after Elsie had stormed upstairs she came down again. She had on a light raincoat and was starting out the front door.

"Where are you going, Elsie?" my mother asked a little sharply.

Elsie stopped and looked at us. She was obviously still upset. She put her hand to her forehead and said, "I've got a terrific headache, and there's a lump the size of an Easter egg swelling up on my left ankle. I feel rotten, and I'm going to catch John before he leaves and have him look me over."

Mother asked Elsie if she were certain something was the matter with her. My father would be annoyed at being kept at his office any later than necessary.

But Elsie replied testily, "Of course I'm sure. You know I'm sick. I've been sick ever since I married Richmond and ruined my health working in that hardware store. Now I've got a lump on my ankle. Tonight it'll be worse." With these words as a parting shot Elsie left the house.

A half hour later father and Elsie returned together. She looked cowed. She was declaring meekly but firmly that she would never compose another note and that she was really critically ill. Father, in turn, was very angry. He replied that Elsie should never set foot inside his office again.

"Not," he shouted, "unless you're on the verge of collapse. A lump the size of an Easter egg!"

It followed naturally that mother was upset because father was angry. Beneath her distress, however, she was amused. "A lump the size of an Easter egg would have been an intriguing phenomenon," she remarked.

While Elsie demanded constant medical attention from my father, she also insisted upon all kinds of attention from mother. She had arrived in Glencoe with her clothes in pitiful condition. Mother could not bear to see her own sister anything but well dressed, so she and Elsie spent long, hot days in Chicago shopping. Once they spent two hours hunting for one pair of shoes. Elsie wanted comfort and style in a triple width with a built-in arch. They brought the pairs home on approval and returned both

Such incidents meant that having Aunt Elsie at the house all summer was a serious strain on peaceful relations. Elsie thinks every luxury is her right. She has always thought mother's life was ideal, because mother had a large home, money for the luxuries of expensive clothes and education, and a circle of rather distinguished friends. When Elsie visits us, she tries to forget Uncle Richmond, the modest white cottage, and the hardware store in Hillside. She loses herself in our house, with its mahogany furniture and shining china. This is the life to which she is entitled; this luxury belongs to her. If, by some stroke of fate, she does not have it, it is the responsibility of us who enjoy it to give it to her. "Share and share alike" is her Communistic cry.

One day in August I returned home from the hospital to find my mother and Lucille waiting for me on the station platform. I noticed with surprise that Aunt Elsie, who usually came along for the ride, was not with them. Lu was smiling broadly, and she looked gay and lovely. There was something childish in the uncontrolled way she placed her feet and carried herself, for she was still very young. She was much younger than many girls of eighteen, who had been matured by long association with young men. Those girls wore clothes with a dash and talked with a finesse carefully designed to attract the wary male. Lu had always dressed casually and talked only when she had something to say. I looked at her as she stood beside a baggage cart and waved at me, and it occurred to me that her disarming eagerness and naïveté had romantic possibilities. She is tall and slender and has blue eyes. Her skin is a delicate reminder of cameos, fair and fragile.

As I stepped from the train she shouted, "Hi, Florence Nightingale!"

I said hello to her and kissed mother. Then, as we walked across the little parking lot, I asked, "Where's Aunt Elsie?"

Lu was quiet and glanced quickly at mother. My mother looked thoughtful. "Elsie's been in bed sleeping all afternoon."

When we arrived at the house, mother came with me to my room. She closed the door quietly and sat down on my bed.

For long-wearing comfort on pavement or green
Plus more for your money, look first for Durene

When you buy a pair of socks . . . and you get the Durene label along with them—man, you're getting a BUY! That goes for polo shirts, underwear, and everything else made of Durene mercerized cotton. They look better . . . give you clearer, cleaner colors—keep their soft lustre through thick and thin. They last longer . . . take pulling and tugging and hauling in their stride. They wash more easily . . . and words like "sag," "stretch," "shrink" are scarcely in their vocabulary! Best of all, they're extra absorbent, extra comfortable. Isn't it just good sense to look for that label "Durene"?

No guesswork about it! Whatever you buy labeled "Made of Durene yarn" is subject to Durene's Quality Control Plan. That means you get double protection . . . the yarn must meet high-quality standards . . . and the merchandise itself must be able to pass laboratory tests of workmanship and performance. So—if the garment you're looking at is stamped or labeled Durene, it's a real value!

"Well, Ann, we've been having trouble with Elsie and your father. He swears he won't live in the same house with her for another forty-eight hours, and, if she uses the ticket she bought the other day, she won't leave for another ten days. Today at lunch he was very brusque with her."

Mother sighed and leaned back on my pillow. I knew how she felt. When my father is brusque, he can be very alarming. Of medium height, his compact body assumes hasty, precise movements, and he barks out his words. When he is brusque, his gentleness changes to suppressed, dynamic fury.

"What's causing the trouble?" I asked in cautious anticipation.

Mother's gray-green eyes clouded with thought. "He found out about what Elsie did two days ago."

"What did she do?" I began to expect nothing short of theft or blackmail, for mother's attitude was loaded with tragic suspense. Suddenly her eyes began to shoot sparks and she sat up straight on the bed.

"Elsie does some of the silliest things I've ever heard of. She took the day off and went in town to see a fortuneteller. Some woman on West Jackson Boulevard who calls herself Mara Rameau."

Fortunetelling had always seemed quite harmless to me, and good fun too. I asked, "Why should dad interest himself in that, or even care what Elsie does?"

"He wouldn't care at all, I'm afraid," sighed mother, "but the whole trip cost ten dollars, and it was his money she spent. He found out about it last night. It gave him a good reason for wanting her to go home."

I asked whether Elsie were conscious of the way my father felt. Mother replied that she thought there was not much that goes on which Aunt Elsie does not at least sense.

May you live all the days of your life. —SWIFT.

"You know, your father and Elsie have never got along well. I only hope John can behave himself for another ten days."

That did not seem possible. I know my father. He is a person of decided tastes, and he has a temper like an old volcano—dormant most of the time, but violent on occasion. There was sufficient reason to worry about the possibility of an explosion.

Fortunately, at dinner that evening everything went smoothly. Aunt Elsie came downstairs dressed in a modest pale blue print dress. She had a rose in her hair to make her feel young. Her face was carefully made up, and she was feeling gay and chipper. We had an amusing, leisurely dinner.

Afterward, the family sat in the library and talked about everyday things. This room had been a drab, dingy catchall before we redecorated it. Now it is the family's favorite meeting place. A window covers the wall overlooking the back lawn, so that it is always very light in the daytime. A second wall is covered with books and, when at night the curtains are drawn and lamps light up my father's medical library in the dark-stained bookcases, it is a cozy and attractive place to be. Tonight I was happy to be home.

MOTHER and Aunt Elsie were discussing clothes. They had spent the entire previous afternoon hunting for a dressy winter coat for Elsie and had been forced to look in almost every Chicago shop from Randolph Street down to the Drake Hotel. Finally they had brought two home to consider. Aunt Elsie was uncertain as to which would be the wiser choice.

"I don't want to look like a dowager," she said. "Which makes me look the younger?"

My father was comfortably settled in a big chair the color of pine needles. He had been reading the Daily News. Now he looked up.

"Do you mean, Louise, that after your morning at Red Cross you spent all afternoon yesterday tracking over the city?"

"Why, yes, John. You see, Elsie has to have a coat, and she'll be leaving soon."

"Does it take two to look for a coat? I always buy my own clothes."

Aunt Elsie turned around on the sofa to face John. She smiled. "You forget what it's like to live in the sticks of sad Montana. Louise knows where to go for clothes better than I do. Besides, she has such wonderful taste. I often think I wouldn't buy anything without her help."

"I'll say you wouldn't," muttered my father. I glanced at him to see whether he was being facetious, but he was frowning.

"John!" my mother warned.

"Well, she wouldn't." My father sat up straight and laid down the newspaper. His voice was a little louder and more urgent. "And I think it's very bad for you to be wearing yourself out in Chicago for no good reason. It's bad for your health."

"Yes, it really is, dear. You haven't been looking at all fresh lately," said Elsie sympathetically.

"NOW, take a look at Elsie. She looks fresh, because she has spent this afternoon in bed. How well she looks out for herself!" he said, standing up and jamming his hands into his pockets. Then he came over to my mother and put his arm around her shoulders. "My dear, you are too helpful to others. You must consider yourself. You must be careful not to strain that heart of yours."

Then an urgent voice interrupted them. "John, I was meaning to tell you about this afternoon," said Elsie. "I had a very bad time." Lu and I had been sitting on the floor, having a quiet game of chess. The catch in Elsie's voice forced us to look up at her. She had a startlingly serious look in spite of her print dress and the ridiculous red rose tucked into her hair. She leaned forward slowly and spoke in slow tones. "I was sitting on the front porch about two o'clock," she told him, "when suddenly I had an attack."

My father sat down heavily in his chair and gazed at Elsie. "What kind of an attack?" he asked after a minute.

"I got another headache and my ears began to hum. That's why I went to bed. What do you think it could be?"

"I can't imagine," said father. "Your physical exam of a week and a half ago showed you as an A-one physical specimen. Nothing serious could have developed since then."

Aunt Elsie spoke faster and laid her hand on my father's knee for emphasis. "Oh, I'm not sure, John. I think something has. Why don't you get your little instrument with the light on it and look in my ear? That's where a lot of the trouble is."

It was Lu's turn to move a chessman. She had seemed to be deep in concentration on the black and white figures on the board. Suddenly, however, she jumped up from the floor and looked at her mother.

"If there's going to be another session with the medical profession," she declared, "I'm going to write a letter." Then, frowning, she left the room.

Father knocked the ashes from his pipe. Then he sat with his hands between his knees and looked at Elsie. I saw the expression of distaste in his blue eyes and thought of the volcano.

He said to her, "I'll do what you want me to, but right now my bag is in my car."

Mother got up quickly and said, "I'll go get it," and before we could stop her she had left the room.

When she had gone father said, "But before I do it, I want to ask you a few things about yourself. Do you realize that Louise has worked very hard for you this summer? Do you know that she is seven years older than you and looks fourteen? Do you know that she has a weak heart?"

"Of course I know," said Elsie. Her voice was soft and affectionate, and its tones stroked the air with their smoothness. "I've often worried about her condition. There is no one in this world more kind and generous than Louise. She is always helping others. We all love her."

My father got up and walked swiftly across the room. One of his most outstanding traits is frankness, and Aunt Elsie's silky voice had irritated him. He was oblivious of anyone in the room except Elsie.

"Of course you love her. She's so generous. She does so many things for you. That's why you love her. It's nice to have someone to worry about you, isn't it?" The volcano had been teased too long. It was beginning to erupt.

"There is nothing I want less to do than to cause trouble for Louise." Aunt Elsie was sincere and her eyes were troubled.

"Then the best thing for you to do is to go home. That way she only worries about you whenever the mail arrives." Father went over and sat down on the couch, facing Aunt Elsie. His voice was clipped and tense. "Look here, this business has got to stop. You come for the summer and shift all your troubles to us. You remind us of the mortgage on your house, you tell us about your cars. Next it will be your heart, your neck and your legs. You tell us how poor you are, you envy us everything we have. You're not sick. There are many others who aren't as well off as you are. Stand on your own feet. And for heaven's sake, go home."

Aunt Elsie has known my father for many years. She was not amazed; she was simply curious. She stood up and faced him squarely. "What makes you think that I enjoy bringing my troubles to you?" she said. "It makes me sick that I never can depend on Richmond. Even though it is your duty as next of kin to look after me, I hate coming to you. You're so begrudging."

"Begrudging!" shouted Father. "I like your two girls. They may come here any time and stay as long as they want to. Glad to have them. And I don't mind buying things for you. But month after month we've been bothered with your inadequacies. You've preyed on us year after year, and now I'm fed up."

Aunt Elsie moved toward the door. She clasped her hands, and her nervous, defiant eyes all at once seemed the most prominent feature in her face. "I have some pride, after all. You cannot talk to me in that tone and expect me to forget it. I will never forgive you. Never! I can assure you I'll leave tomorrow if possible."

For a minute neither of them spoke. I remember how I sat in a chair in the corner, afraid to talk, listening to silence thunder by. Then my father said in a quieter way: "I don't want to cause any permanent trouble. You are welcome to visit us again in the future. Only leave as quickly as possible now, and hereafter never stay for more than a week at a time."

Two days later Aunt Elsie and Peggy did leave. In the interim word had been received from Northwestern University that Lu had been accepted there on scholarship. It was what she had been longing for. A girl never existed who yearned to live a gay, bright life more than did Lucille. Her primary fear was that she would be forced to go to a tiny college in her home state. Chicago offered all the glamour that Hillside lacked. When mother suggested, just before Aunt Elsie's departure, that Lu might as well stay in Glencoe during the three weeks before she started college, thus saving train-fare between Chicago and Montana, Lu said, "Oh, yes. That would be neat!" Aunt Elsie was not so enthusiastic about the plan. Ever since Peggy was born twelve years ago, she had paid little attention to Lu. They both love music and laughter, but these are the only tastes upon which they agree. Nevertheless, now that Lu was to be away from home almost permanently, Aunt Elsie became sad at the prospect of their parting.

Yet it was apparent that mother's suggestion was the most economical one, so, on the afternoon Aunt Elsie and Peggy left, Lu stood with mother and me on the station platform and watched the train pull out. I do not think Lu was sorry to see Elsie leave.

Every true woman is both a capitalist and an optimist from birth. —ROBERT S. HERRICK.

She loves her mother only when she consciously thinks about it. Their desires are like two identical ions which repel each other because of their very similarity. Lu knew, even if unconsciously, that she was about to get the clothes, the excitement and the security her mother wanted. Aunt Elsie knew it too. She must have been thinking of it as her train pulled away that day.

Only a week later I started working at a new job. It was an exciting one, revising the news flashes that come in hourly to the Chicago Daily News. Soon summer began to slip into the past and seem like long ago. Aunt Elsie, however, remained an individual to be thought of in the present, for she sent her wistful letters to my mother with intense regularity. Between Lu and herself, we remained very conscious of the Meyer family. In fact, Lu represented mother's main activity during the month of September. She required many new clothes to make a respectable showing at the university.

MOTHER scheduled the first big shopping expedition for a Saturday afternoon, because Lu claimed she wanted me present to represent the opinion of the younger generation. I met them at noon in the misses' dress section of Field's. Lu was wearing a tailored cotton dress and an awkward piqué hat which looked like 1928. I began to fulfill my capacity as adviser by suggesting she remove the hat. Then we captured a saleslady who showed us wool dresses. She would hold each one out daintily, as though it were fit for a princess, and say, "Thees leetle wan ees veree cheec!" Lu was overawed by the French accent and the gentil manner. She was enchanted with the dresses. She sat forward to feel them and drink in their bright colors. She said, "Ooh, isn't that cute!" many times during the afternoon. She was completely happy. By five-thirty we had been to three stores and encountered five saleswomen, three of whom had French accents. We had been in every section from the moderate-priced ones to the ones which specialized in Schiaparelli originals, for my mother said, "College days are the most formative days of a girl's life. It is important for her to dress well then if she's ever going to." We came home bearing a sun-colored wool dress, a soft red wool suit and a formal dress. Lu was most excited about the formal. It was black velvet with lace set into the shoulders and the skirt. Lu said, "It's so pretty, it gives me chills. Now I'm just waiting for the right person to impress."

When we reached home a letter from Elsie was waiting for us. We collapsed on the sofa and mother read it to Lu and me:

"Dear Louise: I got back to find the house in a mess. It looks as if Richmond had no one to clean it all summer long. That's the way he is—oblivious of his surroundings. If I were that way, too, we would get along together better.

"I have started in to wash all the windows and scrub the floors, and have got along fairly well. But this high altitude has a bad effect on my heart after being in Chicago, and it pounds against my ribs like a bird in a cage. Not conducive to good window washing!

"I know you must be getting Lucille all ready for college. She is very lucky, and Richmond and I both appreciate it. I think a wool dress is what she'll need most. It's what I need too—a wool dress in a warm, fally color to wear to the little concerts here in Hillside. Love, Elsie.

"P.S. Don't let Lucille excite herself."

It was hard to keep volatile Lu from getting excited. When she moved into Northwestern's Willard Hall, she was awed by the building's beauty, its convenience. The first week of school she received invitations from four sororities to come to teas. As soon as she saw the little white printed cards, she telephoned me to report the good news. Her voice was happy. "The girls tell me that Pi Phi and Kappa are the two best. Here's hoping they like me! Wish me luck, friend!"

I soon saw that Lu did not need the help of my good wishes. We all watched her progress in college with admiration. She knew what must happen to her, and she would see that it did happen. At first the only thing Lu cared about was becoming a member of one of the best sororities. She had almost decided to join Kappa when that group dropped her. Lu did not care. She quickly switched her allegiance to Pi Phi and became a member of their exclusive, café-society clique.

Just after her initiation, Lu came out to Glencoe to have dinner with us and tell us everything that had happened to her. She was wearing the new red suit mother had bought for her, and her hair was combed in a sleek new way, completely alien to the manner in which she used to let it hang. Classes had begun, and she was intensely interested in them all. The Pi Phis, she stated, were wonderful girls—a combination of beauty, brains and good humor.

"It's a mystery why they wanted to have me, a weird character from the wild West!" said Lu, her blue eyes wide with complete sincerity. She was sitting carefully in a chair by the secretary. Her legs were crossed with a newly discovered femininity. In her excitement, she talked and talked. "One of my best friends is Lee Saunders," she said proudly. "Her father owns a lot of real estate in Chicago, and a lot of other stuff too. She's a knockout on looks, and she's neat to me. Maybe someday I'll learn to be sophisticated, the way she is. Her home is only a few blocks from campus, and we go over there all the time." Lu paused and added softly, "Last week end I had a date. It was a blind date with a Sigma Chi named Paul Lantz. We went double with Lee, and she took us sailing on Lake Michigan. It was heavenly! I liked Paul a lot. He's got more on the ball than anyone I've met."

Two weeks later Lu showed me a letter Aunt Elsie had written to her. She had added her own amused postscript on the back of the letter, saying, "This is to show that I have great possibilities, and therefore shouldn't go out after dark." The letter Elsie had written was a unique blend of sincere motherly concern with yearning for her own younger days:

My Darling Daughter: The two letters that I've received from you recently sound gay and intriguing. I wish you had told me more about this Lantz boy you have been dating. He must have money if he can afford to take you places like the Panther Room and the Stevens. Very elegant!

The things that amuse young people nowadays are different from the things I enjoyed my year at the Juilliard School of Music. We never thought of going to night clubs. Our supreme entertainment was the theater. In the one year I was there I saw Maude Adams in Legend of Leonora, Wallace Eddinger in Seven Keys to Baldpate and John Drew in Much Ado About Nothing.

I shall never forget New York as it was that winter. I think that was the happiest year of my life. I would like to do it all over again now. West Point was only a short journey away, and I knew the most dashing instructor there! His name was Gerald Cross. I've never known such manly grace combined with such a keen brain. He was a brilliant mathematician. We had an unreasonable amount of fun. On warm Sundays we'd take long strolls on Flirtation Walk and look at the river. And in cold weather we'd spend Sunday afternoon skating in the arena. I think for a while I might have been infatuated with Gerald. He used to say I was the only pretty femme with brains he'd ever met. But he was really too old for me! I'm sure your father is a more suitable age.

Gerry and I used to visit the historic sights of the city instead of going night clubbing, the way you do. It is much easier for a pretty girl to be led astray today with all this drinking and going about than in my day. I hope, Lu, that you will never drink or smoke, and I trust that you will always be very discreet in your conduct with men. You must save yourself and get the most out of all those advantages which I am unable to enjoy in this crazy town. Be sweet and pure. You were born under the sign of Libra, you know, and your stars say that you may become an inspiring influence in the world as a famous musician or painter. They also say that you are capable of a chaste and constant love beneath your restless exterior. Save this love for a worthy object, study and enjoy life. I wish I were a student with you. But your father and I do not begrudge you your luck, despite the fact that Hillside is such a wretched place to live. The altitude still makes me dizzy and now the house is hard to heat.

Louise writes that she is having her old fur coat remade for you. A good idea! How cold is it in Chicago now? Such a coat would feel good in Montana.

Love,
MOTHER.

Autumn Morning

By Jessamyn West

Only this morning did I see
What holds our world together:
Spiders had spent the night
Weaving a cobweb tether.

No others had throughout the night
Such love for earth displayed:
I looked upon their binding webs
And, "God bless spiders" prayed.

Aunt Elsie could warn Lu again and again to be discreet, but she could not keep her from having a good time. Within six weeks after Lu arrived at Northwestern she had accepted Paul Lantz's fraternity pin. She had, in fact, fallen very much in love with him. Aunt Elsie wrote anxious inquiries to her daughter. She wanted to know the usual things—what was his training, what was he like, and, above all, what did all this mean. Lu wrote to her mother that Paul had been to Exeter and was now studying at Northwestern as a pre-law student. She said he was brilliant, but not handsome, and that she was not engaged to him, even unofficially. Beyond this Lu did not take the time to tell Aunt Elsie about anything in detail. She only mentioned places she had been—the Pump Room, Barney's, the Commodore Arms—and interesting people she had met. These affected Aunt Elsie like a small bucket of water thrown to thirsty desert sands. She longed to hear more of the glitter upon which her daughter was thriving, and she wrote to my mother inquiring concerning Paul's looks, his manner, his family.

These letters would have two parts: questions about Lu, and details of her own life at home. She would hitch the two topics together in such a way as this:

Lu writes me that Paul took her to the symphony one afternoon recently. That reminds me that when I first came to Hillside as a bride, I was invited to play the piano with the town orchestra. Those were the days when a woman had to give teas on two consecutive afternoons to invite everyone in town. But now everything is quite different and, in a way, not as nice. Now, when they can get one, they insist upon a concert pianist with their orchestra. Pretty highfalutin ideas for a water hole like this. It was more fun the other way, but probably the orchestra is better off without me. You must encourage Lucille to go to the symphony.

In November Elsie all at once stopped writing to my mother. She did not write for five weeks. Mother must have felt as worried and puzzled as a sparrow whose fledgling has flown the nest and gone she knows not where. The workaday world was not its regular old self without letters from Elsie. Mother was quite sure that she had offended her sister or that Elsie was actually sick. No reply to mother's letters was sent, nor were any explanations given. At last, in great perplexity, mother wrote to Richmond inquiring about Aunt Elsie's health. Straightway she received a reply, not from Uncle Richmond, but from Elsie herself:

Dear Louise: It amuses me that you would ask Richmond how I am. Skip it! It has been at least three years since he looked at a doctor's report or inquired into how I felt. Let's have no more of such inquiries. I have not written because I have not felt like it. I think I'll have a bunch of teeth yanked out and see if that relieves me any. I am still pretty spunky in spite of my discomfort and think perhaps I'll be able to work out something for myself, so please stop worrying. I'll be living at least twenty more years.

I have also not written because I have been too busy. I seldom hear from Lu. She is too excited over Northwestern to be interested in life out in this country. But I have been looking after her welfare. My disability does not prevent me from that.

Elsie left mother to guess the manner in which she had been looking out for Lu's welfare. It was, indeed, not until a year later, when important business brought Elsie to Chicago, that we discovered the nature of this welfare which had so mysteriously silenced her for five weeks. Then Aunt Elsie confessed that she had been meeting three times weekly with a fortuneteller of the town. The woman charged very highly for her supernatural services, and Aunt Elsie had been raising the necessary sum by giving piano lessons. There were two reasons for her not writing us at this time. One was that she lived in dread that my father might find out about the foolish way in which she was spending her money. The other was that she had become completely absorbed with the mysterious allure of the supernatural. For perhaps the only time in her life she became so intensely interested in one thing that all other objects and ideas were of secondary importance. Her active mind and emotional, high-strung heart were completely won over to the investigation of the future, that ribbon which God holds in His hand and lets out bit by bit to man. The future had charmed her.

Aunt Elsie has told me enough about her afternoons with the wonderful fortuneteller in Hillside for me to imagine the complete picture of their hours together. She first called on the woman in response to a tiny advertisement in a bottom corner of the Hillside Herald. It had stated, "You can forestall catastrophe if you have your fortune told by Althea Northam." Once when Elsie was with my entire family she had laughed a high, sharp laugh and said, "I was just being silly when I called on her. Just having a little fun!" Another time she told mother very seriously that she had called on Mrs. Northam to discover what would happen to Lu. I know, however, that Aunt Elsie could not have spent all those afternoons talking about Lu. Fortunetelling is Aunt Elsie's personal opium, the cure-all she depends upon to predict things to come, miraculous things which have nothing to do with Hillside and will waft her into the rich, green fields of the unobtainable.

When Elsie read Mrs. Northam's advertisement, she recalled that she had met a woman of the same name who lived in an ordinary brick bungalow just two blocks away from her own house. That must be the woman! Elsie was intrigued by the thought that Mrs. Northam could be a fortuneteller. She looked so extraordinarily commonplace to be dealing with a subject so unusual as the future. She had muddy blond hair, very deep-set, intense brown eyes and thick lips. More incongruous yet, she did not bother with glass balls, dim lights and gypsy dress. She was happiest when attired in a baggy checked-tweed suit.

When Aunt Elsie paid her first visit to this plain-looking prognostic, Mrs. Northam peered at her kindly, invited her into the living room and asked her to be seated. The living room was not unusual. It contained off-white walls, overstuffed furniture, a few worn-looking Oriental rugs and two large modern paintings. It was not arty or abstract; it was simply poor taste. Aunt Elsie explained that she had come to have her fortune told.

"Well, of course, my dear, I can't tell it today," said Mrs. Northam, her deep-set brown eyes inspecting Elsie closely. "I must get to know you better. My fortunetelling is always done in a series of sittings. It takes

Macaroni-Cheese

1 8-oz. pkg. macaroni
2 tbsps. butter
1 tbsp. flour
¾ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. dry mustard
¼ tsp. TABASCO
2 cups milk
2 cups grated cheese

● Break macaroni, cook and drain. Melt butter, add flour, salt, mustard and TABASCO; stir to smooth paste. Add milk and cook, stirring constantly until mixture comes to a boil; add ½ the grated cheese, stir until melted. Add macaroni to sauce; turn into 1½ qt. casserole; sprinkle remaining cheese on top and bake in moderate oven (400° F.) 20 minutes. Serves 6.

"That makes five?"

"And more if you wish. Once I become

"No. That can't be true! I never was

"But you will. Your daughter will marry

"Who will she marry? Is his name Lantz?"

"Oh, no. Paul is a brilliant boy, but he's

The five-fifteen train had been crowded with businessmen in bulky black and brown overcoats. It had been messy with newspapers and reeking of cigar smoke, and little pools of melted December snow had mixed with the mud in the aisle. It had been just the way I have remembered it since I was able to remember, and it gave me the false, secure feeling that nothing ever changes. I opened my own front door feeling as if I had been giving that quick twist to the doorknob since I had been two. That also gave me the dull, comfortable feeling that nothing will happen that has not happened already.

"Hello, everybody," I shouted.

"Hello, yourself," said a soft voice on my right. Lu had come to see us! She had come on a Monday night! She was sprawled in front of a tremendous fire, resting her chin in her hands. Her foot was tapping absent-mindedly on the Oriental rug, for all her attention was concentrated upon the excitement in her eyes. She said "Hello" again, very softly and slowly, and her eyes sent me code signals which read, "Something has happened. Something unusual! Wait till you hear about it!"

MOTHER came in through the swinging door from the kitchen. She kissed me on the cheek and suggested that Lu and I string the beans. That could come a little later. Lu had news which demanded telling.

"First I want to show Lu my new black wool dress," I said. I looked at her and, as we started upstairs, Lu grinned at me, closing one eye in a college-bred wink.

When we had reached the privacy of my room, Lu closed the door and leaned back on it. She tilted up her chin, and a luminous look of happiness shot from her eyes. "Ann," she said, "I'm in love. Can you imagine that! Me, in love!" She spoke very quickly, as if the joy inside her was a wonderful pain that could be relieved only by sharing it with others. She went over to the bed and threw herself upon it, bringing her knees up to her chin and hugging them.

The world turns aside to let any man pass who knows where he is going.
—DAVID STARR JORDAN

"So Paul has really made a hit and become the man of the hour," I said. "Do you expect me to be surprised?"

Lu straightened out slowly. "Paul?" she asked, as if being recalled from another world. "Oh, Paul Lantz! But he's not the one. This one's name is Arthur." She sat up on the edge of the bed. "Arthur! He's five years older than I am. Twenty-three. Most people wouldn't call him good-looking exactly. He's tall and dark and thin, and he has a long face, a little like Jimmy Stewart's, and big brown eyes."

Lu had gone to a party at Lee Saunders' house with Paul Lantz the evening before. There she met a certain Arthur Ventnor, who had come alone. He wore a dark tweed suit and his thin fingers clutched a pipe. She discovered that he had been a Beta at Northwestern. He was doing promising work in the experimental laboratory of a big electric corporation. When Lu entered the room he had noticed her at once and had come over without waiting to be introduced. He spent the evening with her, talking first seriously and then half jokingly. He talked about physics, modern educational methods, Shakespeare and sex. He had thought a great deal about all these subjects, and, as he talked about them, he would cock his head to one side and peer speculatively into space, as if demanding to know why the universe had been created. Lu knew when she first talked to him that she loved him.

"He's very ambitious," she said happily.

Very ambitious! The words reminded me of the time last summer when Elsie had tried to write a sonata. She had said, "One of us has to be ambitious!" Now here was Lu, in love with an ambitious man. I wondered whether it was possible to fall in love with the ambition instead of the man. Elsie had always wanted an ambitious man and had suffered bitterly because she did not have one. Now Lu saw that she might have more than her mother. Can love be true, I asked myself, if it is for the quality instead of the man? And yet what is a man but the sum of his qualities? I saw Lu watching me to discern what I thought about all this. In my capacity as the elder of us, I realized that I should give her some words of advice, so I reminded her:

"Last week you were in love with Paul. What happened to him? And what makes you think you won't fall in love with a third man next week?"

Lu sat up quickly to defend herself. "Don't be silly," she said. "I only tried to make myself think I loved Paul. I knew it wasn't the real thing. Paul was too young for me."

"He was two years older," I reminded her.

"But a boy of twenty isn't even grown up. Paul had years of schooling ahead of him. It's different with Art. He knows a lot, and he's been through a lot. I'm sure about Art."

"Well, all right then," I said, shrugging my shoulders. "The deluge is on. But from my long experience with affairs of the heart, I advise you not to rush into anything." There! I had done it. My duty was complete. I would make no mention of how Elsie might react to this.

"Oh, it's all right about Art. I can trust him." Lu leaned back on the pillow. She closed her eyes for a minute. Then she opened them wide. "You know what?" she said. "Art's father owns half of River Forest."

From that day on it was difficult to understand how Lu managed to remain in college. Her studies were wedged into odd, unimportant hours—a little after lunch, a page or two of reading before breakfast. In the evenings she was always out with Art. He took her to all the plays, they went to countless dances, they spent many hours in the cheap collegiate taverns of Howard Street, talking.

Lu came to see us often and talked continually about Art. She did not often, however, go to the trouble of writing to her mother. Elsie received most of the news about Art from my mother, who felt it her duty as Lu's guardian to inform Elsie of everything that occurred.

Elsie was not surprised at her daughter's sudden romance. She wrote to my mother, "God told me from the first that Lu was not serious about that Lantz boy! Pooh! I knew she'd start going with someone else soon." But although Aunt Elsie was not surprised, she exhibited a curious intense interest in Art Ventnor. It was very different from the vicarious enjoyment she had received from Lu's dates with Paul. It was a more serious, more deeply concerned interest. She wrote mother saying, "You tell me that Art is an unusual boy—very intelligent and ambitious. Lu tells me his father is a well-to-do merchant. This is all fine, but I want Lu to understand that she is far too young to consider anyone seriously. Let the boy find someone else nearer his own age. Lu is too young to fall in love. The boy is obviously too mature for her." And, in closing, Elsie added a strange question: "Tell me, does Art like to travel? Has he ever been to the East Coast—to Virginia or to Florida?"

A little later Elsie wrote to Lu in her new intent way and said, "Nobody knows better than your mother how we all want security, something to cling to. Nobody knows that better than I do, dear. I have been looking for it too long. But you are too young to possess it now, or even to desire it. Remember this when you go out with the Ventnor boy." Lu paid slight attention to these letters from her mother. If I was present, she would laugh and hand them to me. After reading them over once casually, she would flick them into the wastepaper basket beside her desk. But Elsie continued to throw out little remarks betraying the deepest part of her heart's desires. On pale, cheap stationery, she wrote, "Mr. Ventnor is well known, isn't he?" and "Lu tells me Art's work is exceedingly important in electrical research." Most often she would write, "Lu must not consider this boy seriously." But as Lu became increasingly interested in Art and kept her interest a secret from no one, Elsie came to mention him less and less. Two months passed. By the beginning of February Elsie's letters sounded as if she had forgotten about Lu and Art. They sounded as if she did not care to remember.

Art had been planning for some time to take Lu out on Valentine's Day to dine her properly in token of the occasion. An ensign friend of mine had come home to Glencoe on leave, and the four of us were going out together. The day itself was promising. As I walked to the train that morning I felt the sun shining brightly, so that the snow in all the front yards on our street glistened with little twisted rivulets of water. By the time I returned that evening most of the snow had sunk into the soft, wet ground and spring was in the air.

Lu and Art drove up in front of the house forty-five minutes earlier than we had expected them. My ensign had not yet arrived, and I was barely dressed. I hurried downstairs and found them standing in the doorway, looking quiet and tentative. Art was poised and polite, shaking hands and reassuring mother as to the condition of the roads. His black chesterfield and white scarf made him look very thin and dignified. Lu had on a soft green coat with a mink collar which seemed to nestle close to her neck to set off the petal-and-peach colors of her pale skin. One look at her convinced me that it was really Valentine's Day. For her there had never been a Valentine's Day before this one. They came inside and, as they had done often before, Art retired to the living room to have a talk with my father while Lu drew me upstairs. I supposed she wanted to have a few minutes of feminine chatter over the dressing table.

In my room, she closed the door and came over to where I stood. "Ann," she breathed softly. "Ann." I looked around at her. She stood with her hands behind her back. She was very erect, and her feet were placed wide apart, like a man's. She had an eager half-smile on her lips. "Art gave me a present today," she stated. "Guess what it is."

"A fraternity pin," I answered. I knew it must be something exciting.

"Oh, no!" said Lu. She stood silent for a minute, letting my thoughts dangle into uncertainty. Then she whispered, "Look!"

She fluttered her left hand in front of my eyes, and there was a diamond. A large oval jewel surrounded on two sides by rare, tiny stones caught the light and flashed fire from her slender fingers. It was cut into many facets, and it gathered in the harsh electric light, transformed it and sent it forth in all colors—ruby, emerald, pale yellow and sapphire. For a second neither of us said a word. We gazed at the diamond.

Then I regained enough poise to gasp out a few trite words. "Why, Lu! How wonderful! You're engaged!"

Lu had always been my personal "man Friday." It had never occurred to me, or to any of us except Elsie, that she would get married for a long time. It had been a quick romance of less than three months' acquaintance. Lu had seen what she wanted and had lost no time in getting it.

I had been told that Aunt Elsie had known Uncle Richmond six years before she married him. Perhaps if she could have married a man like Art she would not have spent so much time about it, for Elsie is, basically, as emotional and sentimental as Lu could ever be.

"Have you told your mother?"

"No," she said, "but I will. There'll be plenty of time to hear her talk about it!"

Just then my mother, who never liked to be left out of anything, came into the room. Lu did the simplest thing. She merely held out her left hand and waited for the inevitable exclamations of surprise. Mother was very satisfactorily amazed. After a second of shocked silence, she kissed Lu and wished her happiness. But I could tell that beneath the surface of her friendly gray eyes there was worry. Here was her sister's child, a mere youngster, engaged! Mother knew Aunt Elsie would be furious and would come to her to ask, "How did this happen?" It had all occurred so fast that mother could not explain it. Although her wishes for Lu's happiness were sincere, her manner was a little hesitant. She must have felt as strange as if she had seen a mirage materialize before her eyes; but it was a formidable mountain instead of a green oasis.

We went downstairs to tell my father of the current event. Lu laughed brightly on the way down, and she clung tightly to the banister. She has always been slightly overawed by her uncle. He looked harmless enough now as he slumped in a big flowered chair listening to Art talk. There were lines in his forehead from frowning, but they were noticeable now only because he was tired. Art was sitting on the blue sofa, his arms folded, his long fingers tapping nervously.

Mother came over to father and said, "John, Lu and Art are engaged."

In a second my father had sat up very straight and was carefully examining the diamond-bedecked hand Lu proffered for his inspection. None of us said a word. Stillness echoed through the house with a deafening thunder. Then father got up and stood before the fireplace.

"Oh, my God," he said. He said it softly, quickly and definitely.

That broke the spell of anxious silence, and we all began to talk at once. Father and mother asked Lu and Art if they were sure that this was what they wanted. They could not be persuaded to think they had made a mistake. The wedding would be in June at the university where they had met. Art said the Ventnors had known about the engagement two weeks ago and could not have been happier about it. They already loved Lu as their own daughter. Lu would wear a long white dress and carry orchids down a candle-lit aisle.

My father asked, "Lu, have you told Elsie about this yet?"

Lu tossed her fair hair and murmured no. "But I'll do it right away," she promised. "Every sane person will be happy to know what a prize I'm winning." She smiled up at Art, beside her on the sofa.

The next time I saw Lu we met for luncheon in the Walnut Room at Field's. She had spent the morning browsing in the glassware and china departments, and she was becoming momentarily more enthusiastic at the prospect of housekeeping. After she had laid her purse down and pulled off her gloves, she announced that she had found the china pattern she must have. It was Spode, a delicate cream color with two wide bands of plain gold around the edge. Lu opened her purse, fumbled for her glasses and whipped them on, the better to describe the china.

"It's different from anything we've ever had," she said. "Mother has a little Wedgwood, but nothing like this. We never could afford anything like this."

"It must be exquisite," I agreed. "Exquisite—and expensive."

Lu hesitated a minute. "Expensive?" she asked, as if to discover the meaning of the word. "Oh, yes, it is," she said regretfully. "It's ten dollars a plate." She paused while I rapidly calculated the price of a dozen complete settings. "But I think one should have what one really wants, don't you?" she asked, leaning forward eagerly. "After all, I'm going to use this all my life. Mother never did have exactly what she wanted." At the mention of Elsie, Lu sobered. She stared at her water glass with a fathomless expression, resembling a scientist peering through his microscope at a new puzzle. Then she looked up quickly and said, "By the way, I heard from mother this morning." It was the first letter Elsie had written to Lu since the news of the engagement. I did not ask to hear what Elsie had written. Lu's half-parted lips and serious eyes were obviously about to reveal something. What she told me was not in harmony with her grave air. It was like expecting cough medicine and being fed crème de menthe. "Mother's letter was magnificent," Lu said. "It was all I could have asked for. She says she is glad I am so happy."

"Is that all she said?" I asked. I could hardly believe it.

"That's all of importance. It was all good," Lu answered. I could see by the expression of surprise in her serious blue eyes that she, too, was almost incredulous. It was as though we had suddenly found ourselves with a heap of gold nuggets, and we could not decide whether they were real. Then Lu added in a curious low voice, "But, you know, something in the tone of mother's letter implies that she thinks I'm kidding about this. Mother said 'If you are quite sure' just as if she was certain I am not sure. Underneath it all, she doesn't sound excited."

This was very true. Aunt Elsie seemed unusually calm about the engagement. She wrote continually saying that she was happy about it. "I want to be sure Lu has all that I have missed," she would say. But she never seemed to recognize the finality of the event. Week followed week, and throughout the spring her attitude was as generous and loving as a mother's could be; but she never mentioned the fact that engagement is followed by marriage, and that after marriage there is no romance except with one person. I wondered what would happen when the cold waters of reality awakened Elsie to the fact that Lu was actually going to get married. Finally, a month before the wedding, we received a telegram from Aunt Elsie.

PEGGY AND I ARRIVE TOMORROW 10:30 A.M. TO MEET ART. RICHMOND TO JOIN US LATER.

Father's one-week limit to Elsie's visits was, of necessity, broken with the advent of the wedding. Mother and I persuaded him that, for Lu's sake, he should allow Elsie to remain in the house until after the wedding. She would be with us four weeks.

The night of her arrival we were all invited to the Ventnors' home for dinner. Although they had met my family several times, they had done no more than exchange letters with Aunt Elsie. This was to be a grand meeting of the two clans of Ventnor and Meyer, with the Russells thrown in.

Aunt Elsie had made haste to install herself in a suite of rooms on the third floor, because she claimed that was the only place in the house quiet enough to sleep. She had spent all night in the chair car and she was exhausted. Consequently, she had been stretched out on a big double bed sleeping soundly since two-thirty.

At five o'clock, when the household was in a frenzy of preparation, someone suggested that it would be nice for me to wake Aunt Elsie. When I reached her room, I was greeted by two enormous old suitcases gaping open in the middle of the floor. Piles of summer dresses weighted down the chairs. The dressing table was covered with powder, and the sheets were piled in disarray on the bed from which Elsie had just risen. Attired in a white satin slip, she moved calmly among all this pandemonium. She looked as though she had never been tired in her life.

"Hello, Annie Russell, my love," she said. She picked up a powder puff to pat her young-looking skin, and she ran a comb through her dark hair.

Downstairs, dressing had been accomplished in a more orderly fashion. None of us, except perhaps Lu and Peggy, possesses Aunt Elsie's clairvoyant ability to locate the slightest small object in an upset room. The second floor looked as it usually did. The only signs of activity were the bzzz of my father's shaver in the bathroom, and the sound of my mother moving around in her dressing room. For the most part, stillness reigned. It was the stillness that presages a big event. It was like the calm on a beach an hour before the rush of high tide.

At six-thirty our car pulled up before the Ventnor residence. It was a massive, red-brick house landscaped with carefully placed evergreens. At the door was a small concrete landing fronted by an iron railing, around which, on either side, steps curved down to the walk. Mrs. Ventnor, dressed in cool white silk to accentuate the white in her hair, stood just inside to greet us. I remembered again that she had never met Aunt Elsie, never even heard anything about her except that she was Lu's mother. Mrs. Ventnor must have been expecting Elsie to be a mother like most mothers—happy at the prospect of a wedding, eager for her daughter's welfare. She stood at the door now, utterly calm, as if it had never occurred to her that plans could be less than perfect. Her brown eyes were warm as she kissed Lu, and they were friendly as she shook hands for the first time with Aunt Elsie. Elsie was dressed in sweet Alice blue, and, thinking it made her look young, she had stuck a rose over her right ear. She had a pseudo-cheerful expression which stamped her as ill-at-ease.

It was impossible, however, to be ill-at-ease with Mr. William Ventnor. He stood by the stairway, his right arm extended in greeting, enormous in a tan gabardine suit. "Welcome be the in-laws!" he shouted, shaking Elsie's arm vigorously up and down. "Welcome to our happy home. Who wouldn't be happy," he added, "to welcome this beautiful maiden into the family!"

Beside him stood Art, at ease, smoking a cigarette. Long warm days in the laboratory had made his skin pale to the point of transparency. He looked very tall as he bent over Aunt Elsie. He said what anyone would have said—"I'm so very glad to meet you"—but his quiet, slow voice was sincere.

The rest of the Ventnor family was scattered about the living room. There was David, a successful lawyer of thirty-two, sitting with arms folded on a gold-brocade couch. Beside him was Jane, his wife, fair and plump. Little David, Jr., plunked on the floor playing with an empty squirt gun, wore glasses and was like his father, dark and tall for his age. Across the room was John, part owner and director of a large Chicago aluminum plant. He was the tallest of the Ventnors and, like a tree bent under the weight of too much snow, he stooped over so that, at times, he seemed almost hunchbacked.

In front of the fireplace a pretty, red-haired woman sat in a green-damask chair. She was Sally, John's wife, and she stepped forward to greet us.

Aunt Elsie sat on the sofa looking bewildered. Mrs. Ventnor leaned her chin on a carefully manicured hand and smiled at Elsie. "You must have had a wretched time getting here," she sympathized. "Pullman reservations are so difficult to get."

Before Elsie could reply, Peggy's guileless young voice broke in. "We didn't come on a Pullman. We came in the chair car."

Everyone looked over in the corner of the room. Peggy, pretty in blue organdy, had installed herself on a small stool. Her blue eyes were wide with the honest desire to have us understand everything.

"They were that difficult to get!" exclaimed Jane. "Well, that must have been a hard trip!"

"Oh," said Peggy quickly, "we always ride in the chair car. I've never been in a Pullman."

No one had a reply to this. The trustful frankness of her revelation had disarmed us all. Aunt Elsie crossed her legs and smiled painfully into the silence. She looked miserable. Suddenly I felt sorry for her; I felt immensely sorry for this woman who had never learned that lack of money is nothing of which to be ashamed. Why, I thought, hasn't someone told Elsie to admit her hardships openly, instead of making herself an object of perplexity by hiding them?

Then Art was taken with a fit of coughing. He said, "Well," pushed his hands into his pockets and leaned against the fireplace, "chair car's the best way to travel."

"At any rate," said Mrs. Ventnor, "it is a shame that your husband couldn't have come with you. But I know the demands of his business must be very pressing. Sometimes William sits up studying business matters until two and three in the morning. He owns a string of men's-clothing stores, you know—twelve throughout the city and suburbs—and his junior executives keep him very busy indeed."

Elsie laughed as if she understood. She kept running her hand slowly over the gold-brocade couch, as if to evaluate the quality of its material. Richmond, she said brightly, found it difficult to get enough help and, consequently, had to work overtime.

THIS seemed to interest Art. He straightened up and lighted a cigarette from the end of the one he had just finished. "We've had the same difficulty with the men at the plant," he said. "It takes about nine hundred and fifty men to keep that electrical plant working at full production," he stated, pointing with his cigarette to emphasize the importance of his words. "And you'd be surprised to know that, even in such an important industry as ours, it's all we can do to keep eight hundred and fifty on the job." He paused, and his dark eyes smiled at Aunt Elsie. "Lu tells me Mr. Meyer is in the hardware business. It takes fifteen men to run some of the large ones in Chicago. How many does Mr. Meyer employ?"

Elsie did not reply for a minute. She had a right to be taken aback by this question, for it showed that Lu had told her fiancé almost nothing about her family, her father or the way they lived.

Elsie finally murmured, "We employ just one," and added, "One and a girl. It's a small hardware store."

She was still running her hand up and down the couch and smiling. I couldn't help but think of our Scotty, Mickey, who wags his tail furiously to prevent being reproached. Elsie was not herself; she was not witty and charming. At other parties her inbred love for a good time had put her at ease. Now some sense of deficiency bothered her; something sad and self-inflicted stood between her and these friendly people.

SOON afterward we went into the dining room to a long mahogany table set with a sparkling-white damask cloth. On this were service plates with wide green borders which matched the shaded greens of the wall murals depicting satyrs chasing dryads across mountains. I watched Elsie study the wallpaper as she was seated. Then I saw her take a drink of water, eying her crystal goblet speculatively. She did not miss a detail.

Dinnertime passed quickly with Mr. Ventnor at the head of the table to amuse us while he carved the turkey. Elsie sat at his right and laughed a lot. Sometimes she seemed to be having fun, and the candlelight, outlining her mouth and nose, made her look almost pretty. Art sat across from her so that she could get to know him better. The flickering light made him look even thinner than usual, but he cocked his head to one side in his characteristic way and concentrated on entertaining Elsie.

Soon the talk was all about the wedding. Mother revealed that she and Lu had selected the wedding dress some time ago, and I described at length the rose-chiffon dresses all the bridesmaids would be wearing.

Mr. Ventnor wagged his head and said in mock seriousness, "Look here, people. Let's not all get too excited about this show. After all, the beautiful girl isn't married yet. She may decide she'd rather have her freedom."

We all laughed; or, to be exact, we all laughed except Elsie.

By the time we said good-by to the Ventnors that evening, we all felt we knew one another well. They stood in the lighted doorway waving au revoir as we piled into the car. Lu was humming softly to herself, and my father was lighting his pipe, a sign of well-being.

On the drive home, mother told Elsie all she knew about the Ventnors. She revealed that Mr. Ventnor had spent $25,000 sending his children to the best schools, that the eldest son, David, was a Phi Beta Kappa from Harvard, and that John Ventnor owned a large group of apartments on the South Side of Chicago. Elsie was quiet. She sat in the back seat and looked out the window. A strong wind swept over Sheridan Road and shook the oaks which stood, dark and tossing, against the high old houses. By the time we reached Glencoe the storm had overtaken us. The rain was beating down noisily on the pavements, and the black sky was shot with flashes of crimson.

I have found that most families react to violent evening storms by taking to their beds. It gives them a sense of security to be able to pull the covers over their heads and shut out the noise of the thunder. Consequently, as soon as we reached home, we retired to our rooms with little ceremony. I have, however, never known thunder to quench my curiosity. When the house was growing still I went to my mother's room to ask her, in all confidence, what she thought about the Ventnor party. She was still sitting in front of her dressing table creaming her face, so I threw myself down upon her chaise longue to talk.

Mother was a unique combination of idealism and practicality. She was sure that Lu was very much in love with Art. That being the case, she said, Lu was extremely lucky to be marrying into a well-educated, well-bred family which would take care of her every need. I told her Art is not the type of man I could love. I prefer a man who has more vitality of action. But Lu adored him from the minute she saw him.

"It is a fortunate match," mother concluded.

The door opened and Aunt Elsie walked in, wearing a jersey dressing gown with a panel of brilliant green down the front. The belt dragged, loose and untied, and she waved a comb in her right hand. Her hair hung loose and awry about her face, which, without make-up, suddenly looked lined and old. Her eyes were wide with a kind of terror.

"Louise," she whispered, "I must talk to you about this ridiculous affair." She approached us slowly for a few steps and then stopped. "This thing can't go on, you know. I won't have it. Why wasn't I consulted about this earlier?"

Mother faced Elsie, her hands clutching the dresser behind her. She looked surprised and matter-of-fact as she beckoned Elsie to be seated. She spoke to her quietly. She had, she said, told Elsie everything she knew about Art from the first date he had with Lu until this very minute. Elsie had been free to fly to Chicago three months ago when the engagement was first announced.

"Why should I have come? Just why?" asked Elsie accusingly. "It's not as if I, of all people, have the money to come to Chicago at every whipstitch. Oh no, not I! I've always trusted your judgment, Louise. This time I forgot that you could not care for Lu as if she were your own child."

Mother sat down beside me on the chaise longue. Her movements were slow. Her eyes held the same expression I had seen in them as a child, when she would reason with me about right and wrong.

"That is unfair, Elsie," she said firmly. "I have had enough interest in her to send her to college and to buy her everything she has needed. She is as well cared for as Ann, my own child."

"Then how could you have permitted her to do this? How?" Elsie leaned over the footrail of the bed. Her eyes blazed. This evening for the first time she had seen Lu and Art together, and she had met Art's family. Now, faced with reality instead of letters, she was forced to admit a fact she had been evading for months. Lu was getting married; she was slipping away from Aunt Elsie's tiny world to live her own free, happy life. But Aunt Elsie could not afford to have a person escape from her world; already it held too few. She felt that her family, one by one, was being picked up by a rescue boat, while she alone remained stranded on a raft in the middle of the ocean. "You know as well as I do that that boy's not right for Lu," Elsie said, tossing her head. "Why, he'll be dead by the time he's thirty-five. You saw how pale he was, and how thin. He works too hard. Lu'll be a widow before she's a mother."

"Better to work too hard than too little," mother said a little acidly. "As for being thin, I myself weighed only ninety-eight pounds when I was married, and I'm still alive."

AUNT ELSIE flung herself off the bed and paced over to stare out the window at the rain. "Don't make excuses. The Ventnors know that Art's dying from overwork. They know it, and they think they can buy Lu for him with all their money. Just look at that tremendous diamond! I never even had one. I can tell her what it's like not to have one. It's better than bribery." Elsie's voice was harsh and bitter. It seemed directed at the darkness outside, and the rain which splashed against the windowpane in regular, monotonous rhythm. "Of course they want Lu. Who wouldn't? My poor darling's sweet and smart." Elsie paused and turned to face us. "But she's never had anything, never anything until she came here. They think they can take her away from me because they have a large house and a smart son and I don't have anything."

We reasoned with Elsie. Mother talked until she began to clench her fist with every sentence she spoke, and the lines around her mouth and eyes looked weary with the lateness of the hour. There was no foundation for what Elsie believed. With characteristic self-deceit, she had convinced herself that for Lu's own sake the wedding should be broken off. She was persuaded that Art Ventnor's health had been broken by hard work. His family, she insisted, were buying him a wife by a display of their happy home life and their fortune. It was a display which made Elsie miserable.

Mother tried to show Elsie the truth. "Lu is lucky to be marrying into such a nice family," she said.

"Pooh!" snorted Elsie. She paced over to a chest of drawers and back again. Dismay was in her reddened eyes as she looked at us. "You've been taken in too! You, of all people! You've been taken in, fooled!" Her pale, plump fingers wound around the bedpost and clutched it for support. "Well, let me tell you, there's one person who guesses the truth about that anemic genius who wants to be my son-in-law. I'm going to rip this whole situation wide open and lay bare all the rottenness in it. You'll see! I can take matters into my own hands."

Elsie directed her torrent of violent words at my mother. It was a matter between the two sisters. I suddenly realized that I was intruding. Aunt Elsie would rather not have me there to listen and criticize. I was only a niece, not responsible for any of the trouble. I got up and went to the door. As I went out, I saw Aunt Elsie facing my mother like a caged lioness. Through the jersey of her robe I could see her shoulder muscles work tensely, and I heard her tight voice say:

"I don't care what anybody thinks. My daughter is not going to be taken in and bought like a slave girl."

I went to my room, got in bed and turned off the light. Then I lay there for what seemed like an hour or two, listening to the rain, heavy and monotonous outside, listening to the voices in the next room rise and fall and rise again in a rhythm of clipped staccatoes mediated by slow, regular tones. I fell asleep, listening to the rain and the voices.

THE next day was Sunday. My subconscious mind, deceitful master of dreams, whispered that I had had a nightmare, but as I woke and forced myself to consciousness, I knew I had not dreamed at all. I looked outside. The damp pavements were still two shades darker than usual, but the dripping trees were a bright green, and the sun turned the raindrops on the spring grass into slivers of quicksilver. I slipped on a housecoat and ran downstairs, where I found Elsie in the kitchen squeezing oranges.

"Tiri-liri-li," she sang to herself. Then she broke off and started to hum. When she heard me, she turned around and smiled. "Hello, Annie, my sweet. Would you like some orange juice?" I said that I would, thank you, and sat down at the table.

Soon Aunt Elsie joined me, and we sipped our orange juice together. "This is a day for the song of larks and the fluty music of thrushes," she announced solemnly.

Lu walked in, her hair in bobby pins, a woolly robe wrapped about her. Aunt Elsie took her hand and kissed her tenderly on the forehead. Then she pressed Lu into a chair and went to bring her some orange juice.

"My word," exclaimed Lu. "I can get it myself. Don't I always?"

Ignoring this remark, Elsie returned with the glass of fruit juice, sat down and asked, "Did you sleep well last night, dear?" Lu acknowledged that she had slept soundly. "Well, unfortunately, I did not," said Elsie, stroking her chin thoughtfully. "The rain bothered me, and I lay awake thinking about you."

"What about me?" asked Lu a little dryly. She was intent upon helping herself to a strip of bacon.

Aunt Elsie studied the blue spruce outside the window. "Well, I was thinking wouldn't it be nicer to postpone the wedding for a little. I don't understand the necessity for all this rush."

"Where is there any rush?" asked Lu. "I've been engaged since February. I don't see that four months is doing things in a rush."

"But, dear, you've been working hard in ollege all that time, and you're tired. I ant you and Art to have time to rest before he wedding. You both look worn-out."

Lu stuck out her lower lip and stared at er bacon as she cut it. Then she looked up nd said, "I'm all right now, and so is Art."

Here was the opening for which Aunt Elsie ad been waiting. She leaned forward to Lu nd said quickly, "How do you know he is? le looks awfully thin to me. I'd want to ake sure."

Lu leaned back in her chair and gazed eculatively at her mother. "Thinness is no iterion for health," she said. She had the ace not to mention that Elsie, more than easingly plump, is the victim of constant ackaches and migraine headaches. "He just as a little asthma."

"Asthma!" Elsie's voice was laden with arm. "Asthma!" she repeated. "There. hat did I tell you! Asthma is very serious."

"For goodness' sake!" Lu pushed back her air and stood up. "People can have asthma r years and live perfectly normal, healthy es. Don't get so excited."

"Lu, dear, please lower your voice," said sie gently. "I'm not getting excited. I'm ly trying to help you. All that I am saying that Art is not well. He works himself too rd. The whole family looks thin, all except r. Ventnor. That little boy, who couldn't over five, is already wearing glasses with ick lenses. I'll bet all their children are emic and have weak eyes."

"There aren't any other children," said t. She leaned against the pantry shelf. Her ung blue eyes were wide and steely.

"Well, that in itself is indication of some- ng." Elsie picked up her hes and started for the chen. On her way, she pped and added, "The ole family is old enough have quite a bunch of all children by this ne."

There are two ways of spreading light: to be the candle or the mirror that reflects it.
—EDITH WHARTON: Vesalius in Zante.

I saw Lu wince under the insinuation be- d this remark. A flush of red swept over face, and her eyes narrowed to little s. She quickly followed her mother into kitchen and announced, "Well, there more than one. There is. David's wife, e, has a second child, a little girl."

SIE scraped some dishes by the sink. For a inute all we could hear was the chilling nd of a knife grating across the plates. n she said, "You weren't keeping it a et, were you? Why didn't they bring her to he party last night?"

She's too small to be taken out," said Lu. They could have left her upstairs in bed."

u sat down on the kitchen stool and lied her nails. She did believe that her mother's only concern was for her. She and e were seldom congenial, but Lu could deceive her mother. They understood h other too well for deceit. Besides, Lu's k temper is balanced by an honest mind matches her frank face.

he looked up slowly and said, "Jane never s the baby out. You see, the little girl . deaf. She has been since birth."

he sound of the knife grating across the es stopped. For a minute they were t, each waiting for the other to speak. I d the song of a bird outside. And she it's a day for the fluty music of thrushes, I ght ironically.

unt Elsie turned from the sink and came to Lu. Her eyes held almost the same ession of terror and dismay I had seen in n last night. "And you expect me to let marry into a family like that! A family works themselves sick to get rich. A ly which buys you with big engagement s!"

Don't be ridiculous, mother." Lu's voice knifelike, into Elsie's excitement. "The has nothing hereditary. The doctor said It will be all right. You should see it." voice softened. "It's an adorable baby."

unt Elsie sniffed and turned away. At moment mother came in. One glance at ace convinced me that she, in truth, had een asleep last night. She had become old, and tired, and wrinkled, because she felt responsible for Lu's engagement, the engagement Elsie considered so disastrous. I looked at her worn face and then studied Elsie, young for her age. Who was to be the more pitied? Mother, whose happy life was worn away by care, or Elsie, who had never had a happy life? Mother was the one I loved. Elsie was the one for whom I felt sorry. I would not care to have her unusual faculty for self-inflicted suffering. She has a shrewd ability to observe a perfectly normal family and find a flaw in them. She twists it and exaggerates it all out of proportion. Then she presents it proudly, saying, "Look what I have found!"

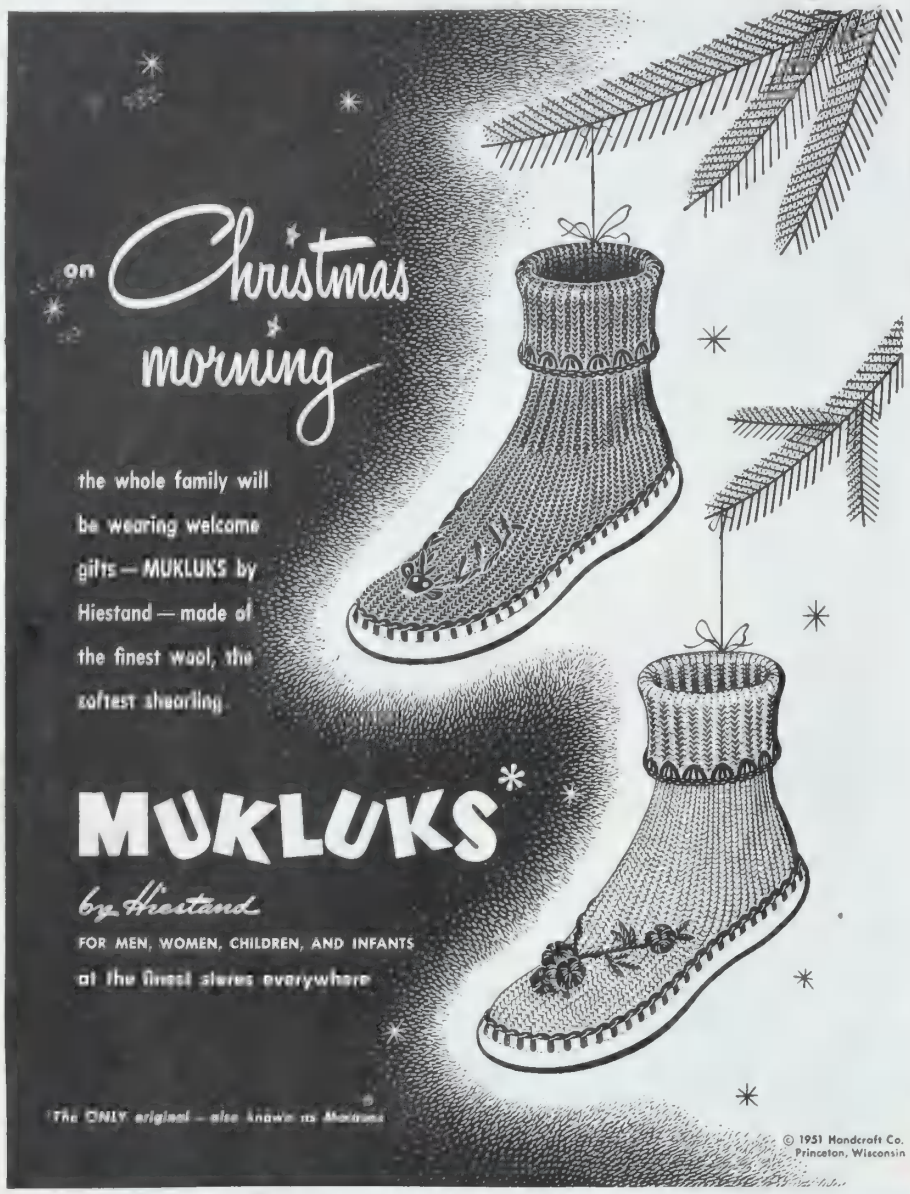
We heard my father returning from his morning golf foursome. He was hanging up his coat in the closet off the front hall.

Elsie looked significantly at my mother. "Now," she said firmly, "we'll get some sound opinion on this matter." She went to beckon my father into the room. "John," she called, "may we talk to you a minute, please?" When he came in, she folded her arms and said, "I want you to tell Lu just what you, as a medical man, think of her marrying into a family which has a baby deaf from birth. Tell her what you think of marrying a man who is half sick with asthma, someone she'll have to coddle and nurse all her life."

FATHER knew he had just happened upon a time bomb. He went over and kissed mother methodically. Then he took off his glasses, held them up to the light and polished them carefully. He told Elsie that he had known about Art's asthma ever since he had first met him. He had written Elsie about it, but she must have forgotten it until now.

"Asthma is something Art will have to take care of. That's true," said my father in a professional tone. "It might be wise for him to give up smoking and perhaps, later, to live in the West, say California. It's a good idea for asthmatics to travel and see what climate suits them best. But asthma is nothing that, under ordinary circumstances, would prevent him from leading a normal life and living to a ripe old age. As for the child," he continued, "that is unfortunate, but it is nothing to concern yourself about. It was probably caused by pressure on the child's nerves as she lay in an irregular position in the womb. It might have happened to anyone."

Aunt Elsie looked as if she had been cheated. The obvious reaction to such reassuring advice was to be calm, but Elsie did not want to be calm. "Well," she said in a righteous, excited voice, "that may be true, but the least Art can do is to have a thorough physical examination. I want proof. I want to examine medical findings." She paused for a minute and looked at all of us. When she spoke again, her voice was high and tense, and her hand fluttered to her throat. "You may think I'm not a sensible person. You've always implied I'm not sensible. Well, I may not have much, and I may not have been many places, but when the life of my child is at stake, I can be good and sensible." She turned her back on us and swung open the door to the dining room.



"Where are you going?" cried Lu and mother together.

"I'm going to call up the Ventnors and have this thing out. Tell them what I think of the whole thing. I'm going to tell Art to have a physical exam. If nobody else around here will take any action, I will."

She went out, letting the door swing to and fro after her. Mother ran after her. Lu sobbed and dashed upstairs. Father and I simply sat in the kitchen and listened to Elsie give a number to the operator. We knew it was useless to stop her. Ill-health was the weapon upon which she had seized to stop the wedding. We would have to wait for that weapon to melt in her hands.

We did not have to wait long. The net result of that unpleasant telephone call was that Art had a thorough physical examination the very next day at the Presbyterian Hospital. The doctor in charge of his case reported to us that he would have been an A-1 physical specimen, had it not been for asthma and a slight case of heat rash on his left instep. Lu had returned to college. When she was told the news, via telephone, she was jubilant.

In the face of these indisputable facts, Aunt Elsie seemed inclined to be reasonable. She smiled and raised her left eyebrow and said, "That relieves my mind on one score!" I wondered what the other still unsettled score was. Elsie would never be content simply to call off the battle of wits she had started with Lu. She told Lu that she wanted to have a final talk with her about Art, a final settlement of ideas. She had a few important things to say to Lu, and the wedding plans could not proceed until she had said them.

Time was growing short, and there were many preparations which demanded attention before the wedding on June sixth. By cutting two classes Lu was able to come to Glencoe the next morning to talk with her mother—to settle the score.

Early in the day Elsie and Peggy got up to prepare breakfast. I think Elsie was very conscious of my father's appraising eye upon her, for she made a great effort to be helpful about the house. When the breakfast dishes were done, she took off her apron, wiped her hands, and said, "Come on, Peggy-weggy. Let's go for a walk." I watched them as they went, hand in hand and half skipping, down the walk into the May sunshine. They had the gayness and unconscious congeniality of two children, not that of mother and daughter. When I left for the commuters' train to Chicago, they had not returned and Lu had not yet arrived.

This was one morning I was sorry I must go to work. At home Elsie was trying to shape the course of her daughter's life. I felt sure of that. Now that the ill-health theory had exploded, she must have thought of something to take its place.

The thought uppermost in my mind all day was to get home early to see what had evolved from the talk between Aunt Elsie and Lu. Work was tedious. Finally I was able to finish the news reports and get the five-thirty train to Glencoe. All the way home I wondered, Who has won? Lu or Elsie? When I walked up to our front door, I saw them. They were sitting on the front porch with a table between them. Elsie was smiling and moving little black men around a checkered board while Lu explained chess.

"Castles," Lu said, "can move at right angles as far as they are able, and knights move one ahead and two to the side or two to the side and one ahead."

Elsie moved a castle and a knight into experimental positions and hummed a theme from the Jupiter Symphony. She smiled fondly at Lu. Their faces were rosy with the reflection of the sunset, which threw streaks of red and gold across the housetops. They glowed with the rare harmony of their spirits.

I hurried inside to find mother. She could explain this remarkable reversal in attitude between Elsie and Lu. When I came upon her, mixing potato salad in the breakfast room, she looked up and gestured toward the front porch.

"Voilà a veritable Naomi and Ruth!" she exclaimed significantly. "Lu arrived about ten this morning, and she sat with her mother on the front porch for three solid hours talking the whole thing out. It was a private conference, so I was not there. All I can say is that they both looked very serious, and they both spoke quietly. At one o'clock they came in to lunch with their arms around each other, and Elsie announced that she is reconciled to the wedding. Lu had told Elsie she would marry Art, with or without her mother's consent, so Elsie said to her, 'Then I give you my blessing.' They've been playing happily together all afternoon."

I returned to the porch.

Elsie was studying the chessboard. She said, "But Lucy, dear, didn't you tell me pawns could move two ahead?"

Lu replied gently, "Yes, mother, but only on their first move."

I went over and sat down on the glider, the better to observe this scene of peace. I wondered how long it would last.

The next week was one of ill-health for Aunt Elsie. She was very quiet and often retired to her room, complaining of a headache. The round of showers which Lu's friends gave for her did not much interest her mother, who did not feel well enough to go to them. As for the trousseau shopping, which occupied all Lu's spare time, it was my mother and not Aunt Elsie who advised and helped the bride-to-be. It was mother who went in town with Lu and showed her the best stores, pointed out the best buys, and helped Lu select the first really fine lingerie and linen she had ever owned. Lu would return home in the late afternoons enthusiastic over the beautiful things she had found, and she would proudly show them to Elsie, who was reclining in a chair or just getting up from a nap.

"Mother, just look at this!" Lu would say, holding up an ivory-colored lacy slip.

"Yes, it's beautiful, dear," Elsie would agree. Then she would pay no more attention.

Something inside her seemed to interest her far more than anything we could say. When we spoke to her, she would start up as if she had been called back from a great distance, back from her thoughts and her private plans.

Often she went out alone for long walks. When we asked where she was going, she would reply, "Out to enjoy the sunset," or "Where I can be alone with God," or simply "Nowhere." One evening about six-thirty she announced to us that she was "going out to think."

"But, dear," said my mother, "couldn't you wait until after dinner? It'll be on the table in half an hour."

Elsie pulled a red sweater over her cotton dress. "No," she said. "No, I couldn't wait another minute. Sunset will be gone in another hour." She spoke in a slow, quiet voice which had undertones of warning in it. We said no more about it, but watched her start off down the street just as the twilight was deepening into night.

I SET the table for dinner, slowly putting the linen mats in their accustomed places. There was no need to hurry. I knew Elsie's walk would take a full hour. And since the avowed purpose of this one was "to think," it might take even longer. Elsie has an unspoiled genius for appreciating the harmony and beauty of Nature. I have known her to return from such walks actually ennobled by a pantheistic communication with God, the pettiness gone from her. But when she is greatly troubled, not even the outdoors and the sunset can free her from her thoughts.

Soon my father arrived home from his office. He read the afternoon mail. He sat down in his easy chair and went slowly and methodically through the evening paper. At seven-thirty, he asked wistfully when we would have dinner.

"Elsie's been out walking since six-thirty," mother explained. "We've been waiting for her."

Father got up and lit his pipe. He threw the match into the fireplace with an angry gesture. "Anybody who doesn't have enough sense to come home to dinner," he said tersely, "doesn't deserve to get any."

That settled the question. We sat down and ate without Elsie. By this time the night was deepening from purple into black. Mother's eyes kept straying away from the table to glance anxiously out the front window. Once, while the dessert was being served, she said, "John, what do you suppose Elsie could be doing? Out by herself at this time of night!"

My father leaned back in his chair and said, "Don't worry. She's old enough to know how to come in out of the dark."

After dinner father went off in his car to call on a patient, and Peggy went out to play with a high-school girl next door. Mother and I sat by ourselves in the library. We read the paper and commented upon the fashions shown on the women's page. I suggested to mother that "bells" was an exciting card game for two people. She said she did not feel up to it tonight. I did not either really. We both preferred to wait, to see what the night would bring. By that time it was nine o'clock. Mother got up and peered out the window into the darkness of the street. Then she went over to the telephone and looked at it as if she expected it to move.

"What on earth could have happened to Elsie!" she exclaimed in a agitated voice.

Father, who had just returned, walked in and said, "She's probably visiting a friend of yours."

We heard Peggy slam the screen door and run upstairs. Mother sat up straight and said to me in a worried voice, "She wouldn't have visited any of my friends without letting me know. She might be anywhere. She might have been run over." She rose and, pressing the palms of her hands together, she continued, "Elsie's so unbalanced. So terribly unbalanced. She might be wandering around the streets all by herself almost hysterical. She might do anything."

The telephone in the dining room rang. Mother ran for it and picked up the receiver as if it were a red-hot coal.

"Hello," she said. I saw the muscles in her face relax. "But Elsie, where are you? We've been so worried about you." Then I saw the expression on her face change from relief to bewilderment. Lines of strain returned to her forehead and her mouth. She said, "All right. All right," and slowly laid the receiver in its cradle again. She came in and looked at us. "Elsie says not to worry. She says she's all right. She is out 'taking care of my daughter's business.' She wouldn't tell me where she is. I could hear another woman talking in the background."

I take great comfort in God. . . . I think He would not let us get at the matchbox so carelessly as He does unless He knew that the frame of His universe was fireproof.
—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

The phrase "taking care of my daughter's business" sounded familiar to me. I had read it in a letter Elsie wrote to mother. At the time, she had been referring to her afternoons with the Hillside fortuneteller. Now she was out talking to some stranger about Lu. A person who could know only the twisted and perverted side of the story must be giving advice to Elsie. Elsie would tell the stranger only half of the truth and receive his advice as if it were gospel!

As the town clock struck ten-thirty, Aunt Elsie walked into the house and into the library. Without saying a word, she sat down on a high stool by the door. Her chest was working up and down, and her sweater was snagged. Her eyes were steely with a kind of crazy firmness. She looked quickly at each of us, her head jerking from one to another.

"I suppose you want to know where I've been," she said. "Well, I'll tell you where. I've been out talking with God." She said it matter-of-factly, as if daring us to question her word. "Yes. I've been out talking with God." She paused, and there was complete silence, broken only by the heaving wheeze of Elsie's chest. Then she threw her head up high. "There will be no wedding," she announced. "I've been out talking with God, and we decided there will be no wedding."

My father leaned forward quickly in his chair and looked at Elsie through narrowed eyelids. "Who was with you when you were talking to God?" he asked in a brusque, demanding tone. "There was someone with you. Louise said she heard a voice behind yours when you called."

Elsie straightened up defensively. "It was a friend of mine. Someone you don't know." Her voice was defiant and evasive.

Father sprang out of his chair and came over to Elsie. Looking directly down at her, he growled, "Don't stall. Who was it that got you so excited?"

Elsie's response to his rough tone was almost a reflex action. "Madame Duvar, the fortuneteller," she said in a quick, frightened whisper.

There was a moment of silence as father, satisfied, walked angrily back to his chair. I looked again at Elsie's snagged sweater and the frightened, half-crazy look in her gray eyes, and pity mingled with disgust for a woman who, in a crucial situation, preferred to trust the cockeyed calculations of a stranger rather than her own common sense. She depended upon a fortuneteller to mother her and give her orders.

My father snapped out another question. "What's this fortuneteller have to do with God? Who is she to say there'll be no wedding?"

ELSIE'S eyes widened slowly, as if she did not understand how so stupid a question could have been asked. She answered with dignity, "But fortunetellers are wonderful spiritual people. They know more about God than anyone else. Sometimes I feel myself getting petty and narrow. When I'm too concerned with my own troubles to get close to God, I go to fortunetellers, and they help me."

Father snorted and tossed his head. "Look here," he said. "Get that silly, superstitious nonsense out of your head. Right now. And hereafter I never want to catch you throwing your money away on those fool idiots who look into glass balls and pretend to see something."

He was a little too brutal. Tact has never been father's strong quality. The disgust in his movements and the rebuke of his commands acted as a dash of cold water to rouse Elsie and bring her up fighting. She rose and stood in the center of the room, smiling cynically at us all, her fingers twitching at her sweater. Her voice was firm and tense.

"Listen to this. I will combat that marriage with every weapon at my command as long as there is an ounce of strength in my dying body. My daughter will not be bought by a filthy rich invalid. A man so greedy for power that he works himself to death! I will not let him buy her because he is rich and we are poor. He forgets that I, at least, have my respect." She took long, slow steps up and down the room, her arms swinging from her shoulders like pendulums, loose and jointless. Then she stopped dead in her tracks and turned on us. "No, I've never had love. I've never been popular. No, I've never had money. But I'm not blind. I still have my ideals. And I say there will be no marriage. Why should Lu have money? I never had it and I'm alive. Why should she marry a pale genius? My husband isn't pale, and he is no genius either. This boy thinks his brains can buy her. The whole family's buying her. Fool's gold. Fool's gold. That's what they dangle in front of her."

Elsie stopped and looked at us. Mother started to speak, but before she was able Elsie cried out in a high voice:

"Say something, all of you. What do you say? Are you with God and me? Or do you prefer the fool's gold?" She was quiet and stared at us again. Then she broke into a loud laugh which grew louder and louder and echoed throughout the house. "All right, my friends, I'll leave you alone to think about the wedding. About how there won't be a wedding. I'll go. I'll leave you." She turned her back on us and flung herself out of the room. I saw her start for the stairs still swinging her arms like two pendulums. On the bottom step she turned to us, her voice suddenly soft. "Good night, Louise. Good night, John. Good night, Annie, my love." Then she went up the stairs humming to herself.

The next morning the heat had already pushed the thermometer mercury up to ninety degrees. By midday the humid atmosphere seemed to press down upon the sidewalks until the concrete bent under the force. Where there are hills, one at least for he has a place to hide from the sun. Surrounded by the flatness of Glencoe, we f

TRY this unusual idea for a beautiful centerpiece on your Thanksgiving dining table . . . a miniature candlelit forest. First cover a shallow box top with dried brown pine needles, wire tips of spruce, cedar and red-berried holly to toothpicks and stick securely into the surface of your box top. Leave a curving path bare through your forest of trees . . . then border with tiny birthday candles. Bank the sides of your box with ivy, evergreen and holly.

OPPORTUNITY KNOCKS . . . offering you a chance to discover whether you have a talent for art. And chances are you have . . . if you like to draw, sketch or paint. And that's important . . . because artists (especially women artists!) are in great demand. There's big money in art, too . . . lots and lots of it. Best of all, you can earn money at home . . . so let me send you this:

FREE ART TALENT TEST . . . an easy, but completely scientific test that quickly tells whether you have a talent for art. It was developed as a result of 36 years experience by one of the world's great art schools and has already helped thousands toward an art career. You can take it at home in your spare time . . . FREE of charge. Just send your name, age and address to Nancy Sasser, 271 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

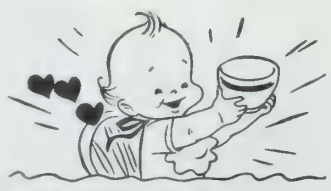
And don't delay . . . for if you do have a definite flair for art you should find out right away and begin turning it into money. Just remember one thing . . . you may be talented and not know it . . . only the Art Talent Test can tell.

BUT ANY DAUGHTER OF EVE can "paint" a pretty picture of herself . . . especially when she depends on CO-ETS to lend a helping hand. They're handy quilted cotton squares, you know . . . downy-soft, silken-smooth and absorbent as only the very finest cotton can be. That's why I consider a CO-ET my best "bet" wherever beauty is served . . . for applying rouge and powder, lotions, astringents and foundations . . . as well as removing excess make-up, nail polish and other make-you-prettier tasks. Which reminds me . . . CO-ETS make wonderful sachets. For added glamour and enchantment, try this:

Saturate several CO-ETS with your very special perfume and tuck them into lingerie drawers, dress pockets, luggage, hat boxes and purses. For gala evenings, tack a scented CO-ET inside the neckline of your dress.

CO-ETS are truly a priceless beauty aid . . . yet cost only 35¢ for the large economy package with 80 quilted squares . . . 19¢ for 40. At all Drug and Cosmetic Counters.

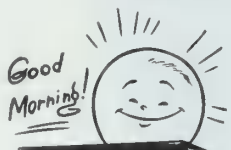
WHICH REMINDS ME . . . every pretty picture should have a pretty frame. So pay particular attention to your hair . . . it can (and should!) be your crowning glory. And John Robert Powers, famous beauty authority, gives this advice—he recommends KREML Shampoo to all his models. It's easy to understand why, too . . . for, unlike drying shampoos that leave hair dry, brittle and unruly, KREML Shampoo has a natural oil base . . . so leaves hair silky soft, a perfect darling to manage and even encourages any natural curl. Another thing I like about KREML Shampoo is its special cleansing qualities . . . they bring out all your hair's natural highlights and make it glisten with natural glamorous sheen. And get KREML Hair Tonic for Friend Husband . . . that ideal way to keep his hair neatly groomed and handsomely in place. Comes in a new package now at the lowest price in KREML history . . . the 16-oz. size saves you up to 40%.



AND NOW A WORD about my favorite subject . . . babies. They give you so much joy but demand so little . . . only to be well fed and kept comfortable. That's why I think every mother should keep Johnson's BABY OIL and Johnson's BABY POWDER in constant attendance in the nursery . . . for this particular "twosome" offers baby-safe protection against irritation, chafing and prickles . . . helps keep baby soothed, sweet and happy. The reason is this . . . both these fine products are made especially to "agree" with baby's delicate skin by America's foremost makers of baby products . . . Johnson & Johnson. But you be the judge:

Smooth on Johnson's BABY OIL at every diaper change, apply to baby's scalp and body after every bath . . . see how this pure, soothing oil helps prevent skin irritation. And sprinkle on soft, silky Johnson's BABY POWDER often . . . note how it wards off little chafes and prickles.

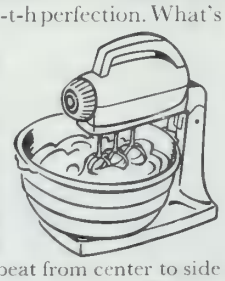
Just be sure you ask for Johnson's BABY OIL and Johnson's BABY POWDER though . . . I don't "vouch" for any other kind.



AND SPEAKING OF BABIES, I'd like to pass along a bit of advice given to me by my pediatrician . . . when I asked him to recommend a baby cereal, he said "CREAM OF RICE". Then went on to explain that this creamy-smooth rice cereal has 3 important advantages over any other kind of cereal:

1. CREAM OF RICE is easier to digest . . . as well as least likely of all kinds of cereals to cause allergic reactions. 2. It gives quicker nutrition . . . new life begins to pour into the system in minutes. 3. Gives more energy . . . for it not only has a higher digestible carbohydrate content, but Vitamins B_1, B_2 and Niacin are added, plus Iron for rich, red blood and better growth.

And do babies like CREAM OF RICE? Indeed they do . . . and if I can believe my own baby's reaction, it's the most delicious dish I give her. I'm sure your baby will love it, too . . . in fact, your whole family will enjoy CREAM OF RICE, the cereal child specialists recommend.

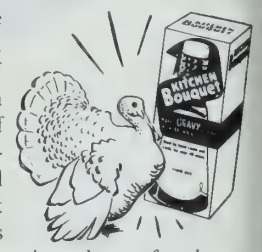


BEFORE I TELL YOU about a cereal for the rest of the family, let me urge you to serve a better breakfast every morning . . . one consisting of fruit or fruit juice, cereal, bread and butter and beverage. And for the best cereal, I recommend POST-TENS . . . a wonderful assortment of 7 different and delicious Post Cereals in 10 individual packages. Just think what this means . . . you simply put POST-TENS on the table and let the family help themselves. With such a wide and wonderful choice, there's no menu monotony, either . . . they can enjoy an old favorite as often as they like or try a new treat every day. For example, POST-TENS offers:

3 pkgs. of Post Toasties, 2 of Grape-Nuts Flakes, 1 of Post's Sugar Crisp, 1 of Post's 40% Bran Flakes, 1 of Grape-Nuts, 1 of Post's Raisin Bran, 1 of Nabisco Shredded Wheat.

POST-TENS are truly a treat to taste, a "toast" to health . . . a wonderful way to greet the day.

LET'S TALK ABOUT YOUR THANKSGIVING DINNER and other holiday menus . . . and let me point out that a GENERAL ELECTRIC Triple-Whip Mixer is the most useful helper-outer you can have. I use mine around-the-clock all year long . . . for it not only makes my work easier, but every dish is s-m-o-o-t-h perfection. What's the G-E Triple-Whip Mixer like? Just listen:



It has a new improved speed selector out in front so you can get the right amount of power, a wonderful juicer and 3 beaters . . . which beat from center to side of bowl for ideal mixing action. They're easier to clean, too . . . because there are no center shafts. And the built-in light shines directly down into the bowl to spotlight those fancy mixing jobs. And . . . a 2-quart and 4-quart bowl come with every mixer. But visit your G-E Dealer and see the G-E Triple-Whip Mixer yourself.

FREE Recipe Booklet . . . beautifully illustrated in color with 56 quick, easy, taste-tempting treats. So HURRY . . . write Nancy Sasser, Dept. S9, 271 Madison Ave., New York 16, N.Y. for yours today!

A LOOK AT THE CALENDAR and you'll know it's time to think about Christmas giving . . . so let me suggest one gift that gives and gives and gives. That's right . . . I mean a PRESTO Cooker. In my opinion, it's just about the nicest present you could give any homemaker (present or future!) . . . for a PRESTO Cooker promises holiday cheer three times a day, every day throughout the year. But let me explain . . . when you give a PRESTO Cooker, you give up to 300 extra hours of kitchen freedom . . . because it cooks meals 3 to 4 times faster. You also give more delicious, more nutritious meals . . . for a PRESTO Cooker seals in health-giving natural vitamins, minerals and food flavors. And remember . . . only PRESTO Cookers have the Pressure-Tru Indicator which makes pressure cooking so easy, so sure, so safe. PRESTO Cookers are available at better Housewares Stores everywhere. Stop in soon . . . and do your Christmas shopping early.

IT WOULDN'T BE THANKSGIVING without Mr. Gobbler . . . and he wouldn't be "himself" without a dark, rich, lusciously-tasting gravy. That's why I urge you to get KITCHEN BOUQUET today and start making perfect gravy without further delay! Not that it requires practice, though . . . because KITCHEN BOUQUET always rewards with an extra-rich, extra-brown and extra-delicious gravy. Doesn't add any artificial flavor like other gravy aids I've used, either . . . for KITCHEN BOUQUET is a delicate blend of choicest vegetables, herbs and spices . . . so it simply brings out the true, natural goodness of turkey or any other fowl or meat. But why go on . . . once you try KITCHEN BOUQUET you'll know why it's been the favorite gravy secret of good cooks for over 75 years . . . and will depend on it to help you make perfect gravy every time . . . all the time! The cost? Oh-so little . . . and just a little at a time is all you need.

YOU'LL WANT TO SERVE lots of quick, easy, economical protein main dishes, too . . . and DEMING'S Recipe Salmon is your best answer. I don't know of any other rich-in-protein food with such a delightful, taste-enticing flavor, or so versatile and satisfying, either . . . still it's priced to please the smallest budget. For proof, get DEMING'S Recipe Pink Salmon and try this new, quick, Full-o'-Salmon Loaf . . . serves four for only 69¢!

Drain and flake into small pieces, removing skin and bone, 2 cups DEMING'S Recipe Salmon (1 lb.). Add and blend together thoroughly ⅓ cup celery chopped fine, ⅓ cup onion, chopped fine, 1 sprig parsley, chopped fine, ½ cup fine bread crumbs, ½ cup mayonnaise, ½ tsp. salt, pepper to taste. Pack into small greased loaf pan, sprinkle generously with paprika. Bake 45 mins. in moderate oven (375° F.)

And for sandwiches, salads and croquettes deluxe, depend on DEMING'S Sam-o-lets . . . a delicious lightmeat salmon with an exclusive DEMING'S feature . . . salmon with the skin removed

FOR A DREAM DESSERT, I suggest this Chocolate Coconut Chiffon Ring, made with the dream-team of the year . . . WALTER BAKER'S Premium No. 1 Unsweetened Chocolate and WALTER BAKER'S 4 in 1 Instant Sweet Cocoa Mix. Try it tonight . . . then you'll understand why I say everything chocolate tastes best when it's BAKER'S!

Soften 1 envelope unflavored gelatine in 1½ cups cold milk. Add ⅓ cup sugar, ¼ tsp. salt, 2 sq. WALTER BAKER'S Unsweetened Chocolate. Cook over hot water until chocolate melts and gelatine is thoroughly dissolved. Beat with rotary beater until well blended. Pour slowly over 3 slightly beaten egg yolks. Cook and stir 3 mins. longer. Cool 10 mins. Add ⅓ cup sugar to 3 stiffly beaten egg whites; beat to stiff peaks. Blend in chocolate mixture. Add 1 tsp. vanilla and half pkg. BAKER'S Coconut, cut. Turn into 1-qt. ring mold. Chill until firm. Unmold. Spread with ½ cup chilled heavy cream and 3 tbsp. WALTER BAKER'S 4 in 1 Cocoa Mix beaten together until fluffy and thick. Top with ½ pkg. BAKER'S Coconut. Makes 8 servings.

TAKE IT EASY ON WASHDAY, TOO . . . by getting a FRIGIDAIRE Automatic Washer to do your laundry for you!

A home with a FRIGIDAIRE Washer is truly a home where there's no washday toil and trouble . . . for all you have to do is put in your clothes, add your soap or detergent . . . then set the Select-O-Dial and forget it. terribly at the mercy of the elements, as if we had been bound to the earth in an open field and left to waste beneath the sun. The heat, pervading every corner of our house, brought with it stillness and expectancy which was more than lethargy and impatience with hot weather. It was a stillness and expectancy which centered upon Elsie. We regarded her as tourists do a volcano which was erupting yesterday and may do so again today. Like the tourists, we walked carefully a safe distance from the rim of the volcano and talked in hushed tones about its activities.

I was awakened early that morning by the sticky feeling of the sheets which clung to me. Throwing them aside, I crawled out of bed and went to open the door of my room. I wanted to see if Aunt Elsie were up, for, although I hoped not to meet her in the hall, I was curious to know whether her mood of near-hysteria and foreboding had lasted through the night. But only her closed door met my inquiring glance and returned it with stolid silence. Aunt Elsie was not yet up! Trying not to disturb her, I crept past the closed door and began to sneak downstairs. I had just reached the bottom step when I glanced down at my feet and caught them tiptoeing along furtively. "This is ridiculous!" I exclaimed and, pulling myself erect, I marched into the breakfast room.

Mother was setting fruit juice at the places on the table. I saw that the fine lines between her eyes and across her forehead looked as if they had been traced into their grooves with a gray pencil. On the tender skin under each eye was a gray-blue circle which had followed in the wake of a sleepless night, and great drops of perspiration stood out on her forehead. She looked up quickly and, seeing that it was only I, she smiled.

"Is she up?" mother asked.

"No. I hope she sleeps all morning," I replied. "That's the best way of taking care of her."

What a father says to his children is not heard by the world but it will be heard by posterity. —JEAN PAUL RICHTER.

Mother sat down wearily and became absorbed in her own thoughts. Finally she asked, "Ann, how do you think this will all turn out? I feel so responsible for anything that may happen."

"But it isn't your fault," I said. I spoke ferociously, because I was indignant that Aunt Elsie should make mother responsible for the mistake of Lu's wedding.

ELSIE had never said it was mother's fault, but the insinuation was there, like a reptile half hidden beneath murky waters. It was there when she had said, "The Ventnors have fooled you too," and when she flung out the remark, "I should have known you couldn't care for Lu as your own daughter." Now, since last night, another worry weighed upon my mother's shoulders. There was the fear that Elsie was planning some cruel, dramatic way of halting the marriage at the very moment of its realization. She seemed to be waiting for us to complete all the wedding plans so that she could destroy them, like a child who builds his tower as high as possible before he pulls out the bottom block. But if she spoiled Lu's wedding, the last bond of affection between Elsie and her daughter would be broken forever, and my mother would blame herself for it.

"All this can't possibly be your fault," I told mother. "Aunt Elsie could have taken the first train to Glencoe after hearing about the engagement. There would have been plenty of time then to break it off. But Elsie didn't take the trouble to do that."

Mother gazed out the window at the dry June grass and drummed her fingers on the table top. "But she trusted my judgment. She probably felt she couldn't afford to make the trip more than once."

"She could have got the money from you. She must have known you'd give it to her."

Mother did not reply. She seemed to concentrate upon the heat waves outside the window. Trouble sat upon her brow with the solid weight of lead, and occasionally she reached up to wipe away the perspiration which stood out on her forehead.

Aunt Elsie strolled into the room reading a book. A flowered housecoat hung loosely over her breast and hips, and a red hair ribbon pulled her dark hair from her forehead.

I smiled with relief when I noticed that her expression was one of sweet contentment and complete absorption. She was as changeable as the weather, stormy one day and calm the day after. She looked up at us, the thought of the book still filling her eyes. Then she saw us and laughed.

"Goodness, Louise," she said to mother. "You look as if you've never seen anyone read before breakfast."

"Of course I have," replied mother, "but not often! What do you have there that's so fascinating it can't wait? Today at this hour a normal person would be complaining about the heat."

AUNT ELSIE came over to us and hastily pulled out a chair and sat down. "You see this," she said with quick interest. "This is a new book I got last night, and it's wonderful. It explains everything." She closed the book to show us the title. It was a book on astrology.

"Elsie!" mother chided. "You shouldn't waste your time on that silly stuff."

Elsie puckered her forehead in surprise at this. "Of course," she explained hastily, "I don't take it seriously! But it is amusing. Besides, the heat makes me feel faint, and this takes my mind off it." She cocked her head at mother and added gaily, "Now, Louise, I'll show you how amusing this can be. I'll tell you all about yourself. You were born August twelfth?" Aunt Elsie ruffled the pages of the book to find the section regarding people born in August.

This, I thought, is the place where the volcano begins to erupt. Just a little bubble at first, but it grows. Mother and I exchanged glances of mingled amusement and alarm. Then, as mother started toward the kitchen to scramble some eggs, Elsie thumbed through the pages and said:

"It's remarkable how much these descriptions really are like the people born in that month. I was reading it last night, and it gives a good general analysis of each one of us. Here we are," she said triumphantly. Elsie found her place and pressed back the pages of the book. As she started to read there was as much belief in her eyes as if she were consulting the atlas to learn the location of the East Indies. This was more than a game to her. It was belief and fact which could reveal the future for which she lived. It was a book full of recipes for happiness, any one of which might be hers. "Listen to this," she said, her voice ringing through the hot, still house. "'On the day of your birth the Sun Giver of all Life, and Jupiter, the Greater Fortune, dominated the astrological heavens. Your sign, Leo, is symbolized by the Lion. It is known as the Royal Sign.' Now, that's true! You have always been real quality, Louise. And here it says, 'You not only possess the kindness and generosity inherent in all people born under Jupiter but, thanks to Leo, you are also highminded and despise that which is underhanded or petty.' That certainly fits you to a T—a combination of royalty and generosity. That's what makes you so good to everyone. It's in your stars."

I wondered briefly how Elsie would explain a kind person whose goodness did not happen to be recorded in the stars. Mother smiled slightly. "Thank you, dear," she said, "but won't you agree that there are people like me who weren't born under the sign of Leo?"

"Probably," Elsie admitted doubtfully. "But this shows you're naturally kind and unselfish. The rest of us weren't born that way and can't be that way." She read on, absentmindedly sipping some coffee she had poured. "Look here," she said suddenly. "It says, 'No matter how humble your home, you convert it into a palace.' Certainly you can't deny the truth in that. You have a flair for interior decorating. Here you have this exquisite house, beautifully furnished in every detail. This beautiful kitchen!" She looked about her and her voice became low and sad. "Who could ask for a pleasanter place to live? I sometimes think the reason I've been fated to live in a dingy little house all my life is that I was born under the sign of Taurus. As a Taurian I am forever giving, pouring out my affection on other people, and I don't have time to worry about my own surroundings."

Elsie did not stop to consider the discrepancy of this remark with her statement that mother, as a Leonian, was uniquely unselfish. She read on without looking up to notice the glance of amusement I was giving her.

"You know," she said happily, "I might as well read right through what it says. I don't know what parts will interest Louise most. Here it says, 'Whatever your life work may be, Jupiter is an omen for success. It especially favors judges, lawyers, physicians, clergymen, bankers—important people generally.'"

I wished that Elsie would be quiet. It was a hot, humid day early in the morning, and, after the previous night, I was not truly amused at her inane love for this stuff. I did not think mother was amused either. From the kitchen came only the sound of eggs sizzling over a hot fire.

Elsie droned on. "'Your natural masterfulness and your executive ability make success almost inevitable.' Why, Louise! How true! You've always been a success, and just the most persistent person!" Elsie smiled at me in sheer good humor and read on. "'Your good health must be guarded. Leonians occasionally display a tendency toward tonsillitis, laryngitis and diphtheria.'"

"Ann"—mother's voice interrupted the reading—"Ann, come in here and see if you can work this ventilator. It sticks."

I ran into the kitchen and found that the fire on the stove made the room unbearable and smoky. Mother was jerking faintly at the cord which operates the ventilator. When she stood aside to let me manage it, I saw that her face was drained of blood and sickly white. She passed one hand weakly over her forehead and looked groggy.

"You're feeling faint?" I asked.

Youth is the pursuit of the unattainable, and middle age the realization of its unattainability. —J. F. G. E. MATHEWS: The Silly Season

She nodded. Quickly I guided her to a chair and forced her to put her head between her knees. Then Elsie and I watched anxiously while the blood, little by little, drained back into mother's face and chased away a little of the whiteness.

Finally she laughed softly and said, "I guess the hot weather's too much for me. I'd better lie down somewhere."

Aunt Elsie and I each supported her and helped her walk out to the shaded front porch. We propped her feet up higher than her head and gave her a large fan to keep the summer heat from distilling on her brow and upper lip. A half hour later she was laughing at her predicament.

"I've never felt faint before in my entire life," she said. "This is a ridiculous way for me to act. I think I'll get up."

She started to swing herself out of the glider upon which she had been lying, but I looked at her and saw her skin still too pale, drawn tight over her cheeks and wrinkled into folds which followed the line of her jaw. I saw the tired slump of her shoulders, and I said, "You lie down for a little while longer. Father's the doctor here. I think I'll just call him and tell him what's happened."

"Ridiculous!" mother muttered. "A fuss over nothing!" but she lay down on the glider again. Then I knew she did not feel well.

It took the operator at the hospital ten minutes to locate my father and get him to the nearest telephone, but when I told him that mother felt faint and did not look well, he was alarmed. As usual in such a situation, he snapped out directions and questions in a brusque tone. "Almost fainted? How'd it happen? What time? That's serious for her. With a heart like hers, we can't have her circulatory system pulling any tricks. Keep her cool and lying down till I get home. Give her cold drinks."

After he hung up, the doorbell rang. I ran to answer it, but when I reached the door Elsie was already there, receiving a large, bulky package from the arms of an expressman. Mother was sitting upon the edge of the glider, looking expectant. I told her with kindly firmness that doctor's orders were to lie down, and so she did, but only after Elsie and I had promised to unwrap the package there on the porch where she could see.

Elsie set the package down carefully in the middle of the floor and said, "It's big enough!"

"I wonder whether we ought to unwrap it," I said dolefully. I knew it was a wedding present, because the package, addressed to Lu, was covered with bright labels which read, "Fragile. Handle with care."

"I don't think she'd mind if we opened it," said Elsie.

Lu wouldn't be in Glencoe for another two days. This might be something that should not be left packed in raffia. Mother and Elsie agreed quickly that Lu would like to have us unwrap it. I ran to get newspapers to protect the floor from the packings, and I brought scissors for cutting the heavy cords around the box. Soon, with great ceremony, I turned back its cardboard flaps and began to dig carefully down into the box. Finally my fingers struck something hard and, parting the raffia around it, I lifted out a big crystal bowl. I held it up so we could all see its gentle convex curve from bottom to edge, so we could admire the clear, shimmering depth of its glass.

Elsie spoke softly. "Oh, it's lovely. It's beautiful. May I see it?" She quickly reached for the bowl.

As I handed it to her, Elsie's hand trembled and jerked. In a second the crystal bowl had tumbled to the floor and had crashed into countless pieces at our feet. We all looked at it in silence.

Then mother pursed her lips and said, "Is there a card? Who sent it?"

Elsie looked very much ashamed and astonished with herself. She had not meant to break the bowl. She had not meant to, yet why did she falter the minute she had it in her hands? As she grasped the bowl, I had felt her fingers quiver as if a sudden chill had shot through them. Perhaps it was because the bowl did not belong to her. Elsie seemed the victim of a desire to smash everything that would make Lu happy. Even though she might consciously combat it, she could not overcome this desire. When I saw the bowl crash, I thought of a child who hopes to kill a snail by scratching its shell.

Aunt Elsie went over to my mother and looked down at her. "I'm sorry," she said. "I don't see how it happened. But, after all, I don't think she'll be needing that sort of thing. I know she won't need it."

Mother sat up and studied Elsie. Finally she said, "She'll need it, all right. But she must understand how it was broken."

Three days before the wedding Uncle Richmond came to Glencoe. I was glad to see him, for I hoped his friendly smile and soothing words might make everything seem right again. He had a leisurely, everything-for-the-best philosophy of life which our family very much needed, and I trusted him to prescribe the cure for the mental anxiety and turmoil his wife had created. His train pulled into Union Station late on the Thursday afternoon before the wedding, and I and father and I were there to meet it.

We stood just inside the gates to the train shed, with a swarm of other people who formed an aisle through which the travelers might walk. There were so many people waiting for the train from Great Falls that we were pressed against one another and pushed back from the gate. Lu was happy to be seeing her father again. She pressed my elbow and whispered, "Isn't this exciting?" We watched the people come from the tr shed in ones, and twos, and threes, businessmen carrying portfolios, and women with their children. We saw a portly man with a big cigar being kissed by his little wife. We saw a harried young mother carry her crying baby from the train. And there was Richmond! He wore a gray suit, too heavy for the heat of the day, and carried a small, badly tattered calfskin suitcase.

When he saw us waving at him he grinned broadly, so that his gold tooth showed, and strode over to us. Putting down his suitcase, he enveloped Lu in his long arms. "Well, baby, how are you?" he drawled affectionately, kissing her on the chin. Then he kissed me, too, and shook hands with my father in the frank, hearty way men have.

I knew that father had two complete and entirely different sets of feelings about Richmond. He had no respect for a man who did not have enough ingenuity to provide for his family, but he had a great deal of respect for the man who had been able to live in the same house with Aunt Elsie for twenty years. When he greeted Richmond, he greeted him as the husband of Elsie, and his eyes and handclasp were full of cordial esteem.

Lu took her father's arm and led him through the crowd to the outside, where our car was parked. She smiled up at him and said, "We aren't wasting any time. You're going to get a chance to meet your future son-in-law tonight. The Ventnors are coming over to dinner. We just have time to get you out to Glencoe and settled before they arrive."

Uncle Richmond replied, "Why, all right, baby. That's fine. Just fine."

Aunt Elsie was waiting to meet us when we arrived home. She was standing in the doorway dressed in a dark summer sheer with many delicate white ruffles around the neck. Elsie has always loved ruffles. When she wears them, she assumes a piquant, birdlike expression, a pleasant consciousness that she is looking feminine. When Richmond came up to her, she simply said "Hello" and stuck forward her head. Uncle Richmond gave her a dutiful peck on the forehead.

THEN she said, "Did you have a hard trip?" and, without waiting for a reply, "I'm glad your train wasn't too late. You must go up and dress right away. The Ventnors will be here in forty-five minutes." She shooed him upstairs before he had time to think about it, calling after him, "Yours is the front room on the right. Lu will show you the way."

So casual! I exclaimed to myself. If Aunt Elsie had felt any emotion upon seeing her husband three days before their daughter's wedding, she had not shown it. Even after a three weeks' vacation from him, she had treated him merely as if he had just returned home from a day's work.

As she turned away from the stairs, she pursed her lips and said to my mother, "I hope Richmond remembers to put on a clean shirt. I usually have to insist upon things like that. He laughs when I tell him about it and then next time goes ahead and does the same old thing again."

Her brow contracted into an annoyed line as she thought of Richmond's troublesome, happy-go-lucky ways. No doubt when she was young and naïvely certain that life gave joy to everyone, this same happy way of life had seemed an insurance of a glorious, easy future. But after their marriage, Elsie had quickly discovered that life gives nothing without receiving payment in work. Richmond's easy way prevented him from making money, and it never occurred to Elsie to get a job, so the happiness of stability was never theirs. Richmond's philosophical leisure, which had at first enchanted her, now was hateful to Elsie. She was a romantic dreamer, embittered because her pipe dreams had caught fire and burned up. Having lost all faith and respect for Richmond, she paid only enough attention to him to see that he looked neat.

When Mr. and Mrs. Ventnor and Art arrived, Elsie was the first to greet them. She shook hands for a long time with each of them and was full of gay, lively chatter which

Gifts that bring a house alive

"I love a clock near me. Its friendly presence . . . its moving hands . . . its mellow tones, are so homey.

"I suppose that's why there is such a revival now, of the old tradition . . . making a fine clock the heart of the room. A clock you love has such a special power to make a room seem 'happy' and alive."

nade the ruffles on her bosom bounce up and lown. Her obvious eagerness to please was a harp contrast to her attitude when Art's amily was not present. It occurred to me hat this evening might seem to her a well-poken prologue to the curtain rises and he real show begins. Making affable ad-ances to the guests was her way of speak-ng the prologue well.

Richmond, in contrast to his wife, did not pproach his future in-laws. He stood off to ne side and greeted each of them as they ame up to him. When Art approached him, he deep lines in Richmond's heavy-set face roadened into a grin of greeting. He clasped Art's hand firmly and said, in easy Western ccents, "How are you, boy? I been waiting o meet you."

"The pleasure is all mine, sir," Art said lowly. His thin, serious face lighted up in a mile of gratitude. A spark of friendship had lready been kindled between them.

"I'll tell you, boy," said Richmond, taking Art's arm and guiding him to a chair in the iving room, "I'm glad to add you to our umber, 'cause I like to have people around. Now Elsie's too busy to be around much, and wo daughters aren't much family anyway, o, naturally, at the prospect of having an ddition to the group, I came East the first hance I could. Besides, it's pretty lonely in house all by yourself."

Mrs. Ventnor came over to the chair which Richmond had offered to her and looked at im with interest. "If I had an opportunity o live at the base of the Rocky Mountains," he said, "I would never want to travel any-lace else. It must have hurt to come from God's country to our plains full of dirt and actories."

Aunt Elsie was sitting near the hall, where the slight breeze from the open front door could keep her cool. Now she broke into the conversation. "That's true, Mrs. Ventnor, but you know that Chicago has many more cultural advantages than our little town. And, after all, culture is more important than scenery. One can live in Paradise, but can he be happy with no food for the mind? I've always told Richmond that Chicago—or, even better, New York or Florida—is the place for him."

"And I've never got around to moving there," said Richmond. He said it slowly and easily, as if it had just rolled off his tongue, but he looked straight at Elsie for a second with a glance of stubborn defiance. She smiled wryly, as if to say, "There, you see how it is!" Then Richmond continued, "No, I've never moved, because I know that no place in the world has pleasanter trout fishing than the mountain streams round about Glacier Park and on the slopes of Swan Range. Trout just leapin' by, and when they don't leap, you can sit and wait for 'em."

"Man! Don't tell me you're a fishing fan," shouted Mr. Ventnor. He got up from his chair across the room and moved closer to Uncle Richmond. His massive face beamed with delight. "Why, fishing's one of my first loves. I go up to Canada for it every time I can manage a vacation. That's the place where you can snag a big fish without even asking for one. All you have to do is drop your line into one of those beautiful lakes."

My father broke eagerly into the conversation. "Right you are! During the week we were in Lake o' the Woods last fall, we dragged in four hundred pounds of muskie and wall-eyed pike with no trouble at all."

Uncle Richmond threw back his head and ughed. Then he winked at father and said, You fellows can have your big muskie and ll-eyes. But Lu and I'd rather fish in Mon- a. Lu goes into the mountains with me ause we've agreed that, when we go fish- , we like to have time to think about it. hing for trout gives us plenty of time." Elsie leaned forward in her chair and iled faintly. In a bright voice she said, Mr. Ventnor, it's too bad you couldn't ne to Montana this summer so that Rich- nd and Lucille could show you their sacred ing spots." She spoke very clearly, put- g an accent on the words "and Lucille." e insinuation was that Lu would not be h Art this summer, but home, as usual.

Mr. Ventnor's jovial face looked puzzled a minute. He nodded toward Art and d, "I doubt whether Lu could drag Art to ntana. He's never cared much for fishing. sides, he wouldn't leave his job that long." Elsie looked over at Art. He was sitting ide Lu on the sofa. Both of them were lis- ing to the conversation, but they seemed possess the detached, trancelike happiness the young in love. "Oh, so young and so bitious!" Elsie exclaimed. I was startled en I heard her. For a minute I thought I ard a sneering quality in her light, gay ce. But I must have been mistaken, for no else noticed a thing.

Mr. Ventnor agreed cheerfully with Elsie. h, yes, very ambitious." He chuckled. ut, you know," he said, "it's a funny ng about my son. I don't think I'd trust n near the water. He never learned to im."

We all laughed at this, even Art himself. did seem ridiculous for a boy of twenty- ee not to know how to im. Richmond re- rked, "You'd better tch your step on the neymoon in Minnesota, t. If you don't treat right, she may just ck you into the water." r laughter increased. The expensive span gabardine over Mr. Ventnor's stomach aved up and down.

Finally Art said, "Look here, I've got to end myself. I never learned how to swim cause I knew it was safe not to. The human dy can float on water for a long time, and if u're pushed overboard a long way from nd, floating is the best way to conserve ur energy and reach shore. And anyone n float without being taught." Art spoke wly and carefully, as if he were explaining e Pythagorean theorem, but his eyes were inkling.

"I can guarantee it's safe to take Art near e water," said Lu. "He knows whereof he aks, so it's safe to take him fishing." She ked at Elsie and added slowly, "But we uldn't go to Montana to fish on our honey- on, because Art's only got a week and at trip would be too expensive. We're go- g to save money. We couldn't even postpone e wedding to go to Montana, because the nt needs Art during the month of July. gets a two-hundred-dollar bonus for being re."

Art spoke in a reassuring voice. "Oh, they ways give you a bonus for getting married. ey make doubly certain to give these nuses just lately when they need men so dly."

Elsie's lips were tight as she listened to t explain the financial advantage of get- g married. Then she said, "So that's what ey do. Well, I can see that you're ambi- us!" She looked at Richmond for a minute he sat stretched out easily in a big chair. knew what she was thinking. She must be inking. See. See why he's getting married. st because it's to his advantage. She's your ughter. You should do something about it, but u're not capable of action. You don't take ough interest to sit up straight. Art takes an erest and you don't. Aunt Elsie grew pale neath her powder. She had taken Art's innocent remark and, with practiced skill, twisted it to suit her own interpretation. She got up, muttered, "Excuse me a minute," and left the room.

I suspect she went off to gain control of herself, so that she could smile her way through the rest of the evening and make these people think she was happy about it. But she wasn't happy about it. Mother and father knew it, and I knew it, and poor Lu knew it.

A FLUFF of white lace and marquisette and rose chiffon covered the Colonial four-poster in my room, like layers of pale clouds over earth. An open suitcase rested on a chair and, beside it, Lu stood in her slip, humming and putting things into it. She folded a pair of stockings with great care and tucked them into one corner. Then she took from the closet a smart-looking green-and-white print dress and folded it in tissue paper with tender care. As soon as she had laid it carefully across the top of the suitcase, she turned to me and said, "I can't believe that in three hours I'll be walking down that aisle. In three hours I'll be getting married, and yet today hasn't seemed any different from any other day. How can the day remain unchanged when all this is happening to me?" It seemed unbelievable to me too. If I had not seen all the preparations, helped to press the dresses, driven the car downtown for gas, I would not have believed it. The day was like yesterday and the day before, as though there would be no wedding. Yet there was Lu, humming and packing to go away.

"Lu! Lu! Lu and Ann!" mother called from downstairs. She came up to the landing between floors to speak to us. "I've fixed a few things to eat before we drive to Evanston," she said. "We must have dinner early, because it wouldn't do to get there any later than an hour and a half before the wedding."

Men like advising women better than doing right themselves. —SPURGEON.

Lu and I left what we were doing and went downstairs. We found the rest of the family already helping themselves to a buffet supper on the dining-room table.

When Elsie saw Lu, she put down her plate and came over to her. Kissing Lu on the forehead, she whispered, "May your wedding day be a happy one, dear child."

I felt weak and watery inside when I looked at Elsie, for she seemed to love Lu a great deal. Her gray eyes were shining very brightly, and her voice was low and emotional.

Lu must have felt the same way I did, for I saw her do something she had never done before. She returned her mother's kiss. Then she said, "But this is my wedding day, and I am happy, mother."

Elsie drew Lu to the side of the room. She looked up at her slender daughter and said, "You know, I don't have much time to tell you how I feel. We've had a lot of quarrels. But I want you to know that I love you because you're mine. Promise me that you'll never leave me. I don't have much, and I want to depend on you."

From where I stood facing Elsie, I could see that her gray eyes were wide and intent. There was something about her expression that made her face look a little sharper than usual. Lu interpreted her mother's demand in the only way possible. She said:

"I want it that way, too, mother. I won't leave you. Even when I'm not with you, you and dad and Peggy will hear from me often."

Elsie started to reply when she was interrupted by a shout from across the dining room. My father, smiling and pointing briskly toward the sideboard, cried, "Whoever wants to drink a toast to the bride can help himself to sherry and join in." We all gathered round while mother poured the amber-colored liquid into small glasses, one for each of us. Even Elsie and Peggy accepted a glass of sherry on this special occasion. "Now then," said my father in a happy, serious tone, "here's to the bride. May she always remain lovely." He lifted his glass toward Lu and drank. "May she always remain happy," amended Richmond. A shout of approval went up among us. That is, among all of us but Elsie. I saw her touch the wineglass to her lips without swallowing and then quietly put it back on the sideboard. If anyone else noticed the gesture, he interpreted it only as Elsie's characteristic refusal to drink liquor. Mother clapped her hands and Peggy jumped up and down shouting, "Good. Good."

The toast made me feel more as if there was really going to be a wedding. Father and Richmond went upstairs to struggle into their summer formal suits, and we went to pack our long dresses, which we had arranged to put on at Lee Saunders' house. Lee, who lived only about three blocks from the chapel, was to be a bridesmaid. When she suggested we all dress at her house to avoid rumpling our clothes, we had eagerly accepted the offer. Now we carefully folded the dresses and gathered together many last-minute items: a string of pearls for one of the bridesmaids; a big white ribbon to tie onto a floral bouquet; and — oh, yes — Lu must borrow something to carry down the aisle. After a hasty discussion, it was agreed that she should carry one of my white linen handkerchiefs. Next we decided that my father and Richmond should drive to Evanston separately and go directly to the church, while the rest of us, in mother's car, would go to the Saunders' house to dress. Finally mother handed me a large bunch of white flowers to hold in the back seat of the car. Then she slipped in behind the steering wheel, and we started for the university.

It was a simple matter to find our way to Evanston by driving south on Sheridan Road which hugs Northwestern campus as closely as a glove on the hand. When we reached the high Gothic church in which Lu would soon become a bride, we turned right and she was able to guide us directly to the Saunders' house. It was a tremendous old mansion set back from the street. In most towns it would have looked out of place, grotesquely large and rather homely. In Evanston, though, it looked only slightly larger and more homely than most of the houses that line the blocks around the university. A century ago many of these were the town's grand houses, built with the generosity of high ceilings and expensive dark woods. Their owners were well-to-do people, proud to be living near the main street, the university and the lake. Today the section is still a respectable one, but the houses have grown old, like old people. They have become antiquated and worn, to be looked on with respect rather than envy. In one of these old houses Lu would don a new dress that meant to her the beginning of freedom.

He who waits to do a great deal of good at once, will never do anything.
—SAMUEL JOHNSON.

MRS. SAUNDERS led mother and Aunt Elsie through the dark old hall and up the mahogany stairway to the second floor, while Lu, Peggy and I followed behind them. We came to a big light room on the southern side of the house. It was Lee Saunders' room, and she and the three other bridesmaids were already getting dressed. Their clothes were carefully spread out on the high, darkly stained bed, and their evening slippers were scattered on the floor. When they saw us, respectful greetings for mother and Aunt Elsie mingled with squeals of delight for Lu.

"You don't look any different," they said. "How do you feel?"

Lu felt well, and she looked well. She started to unpack with the calm deliberation of certainty, and little unexplainable smiles kept coming to her face as she thought of Art and the wedding. Suddenly the room was in a flurry of preparation. An ironing board was set up in one corner near the large bay windows. The girls kept running in and out, to and from the bathroom across the hall, and Peggy looked quite bewildered as she pulled herself into the first girdle she had ever owned. Mrs. Saunders came in to help us dress, and the two other younger Saunders girls stood watching at the door.

Aunt Elsie was not getting dressed. She sat in a small chair and watched the rest of us move about. She had a serene, above-it-all expression on her thin lips, as if she were an Olympian goddess looking down on the frail actions of us mortals. Her smile and her motionless pose looked incongruous amid all this activity, and it irritated me. I felt that it was not natural or right. It reminded me too much of the disturbing calm I had seen her maintain at other times, when she seemed to say, "This is all so silly. There's no point to it." She was watching a show and waiting for it to reach its climax, waiting to see how it would end. Finally I suggested that she get dressed.

Aunt Elsie laughed gaily and lightly. "Oh don't worry about me," she answered. "I'll be ready on time. I know how long it takes you young people to dress. But it won't take me long. I'll be ready."

SHE carried the pastel formal gown she had borrowed from my mother over to the ironing board and slowly began to press it, taking time out after every stroke of the iron to talk or to gaze out the window at the people on the street. By the time Peggy had struggled into her youthful rose dress and had proudly arranged the satin ribbons and rose buds which fell from the waist, Aunt Elsie had progressed to the point of taking off her street dress.

"Mrs. Meyer, you'd better hurry!" exclaimed Lee Saunders as she came over to the dressing table to pick out her best lipstick.

"I've got time!" said Elsie. She sat Peggy down on a stool in front of the mirror and began to brush her hair into long brown curls around her fingers. She brushed carefully and slowly, as if she got a sensuous pleasure from feeling each smooth glossy strand.

Mother had just slipped into her gown. It was a blue that accented the blue undertones in her gray-green eyes, and, against the silver of her hair, it made her look cool and refreshing, like an iced drink or like moonlight on snow. But when she happened to see Aunt Elsie, still in her slip, fastening a hair ribbon into Peggy's hair, her eyes grew hot and she said hastily:

"Elsie! For heaven's sake! It's seven twenty now. We're supposed to be at the church in less than ten minutes. Do you want to be late for your own daughter's wedding?"

Elsie ignored the question. Deliberately she laid down the comb and started to dress.

From the next room, where Lu had gone to put on her bridal dress, we heard long exclamations of admiration. "Oooh, how beautiful you look!" I heard the voices of the two bridesmaids who were with her rise and cry with delight. There were practical suggestions: "Your hair a bit more this way." "There, just a shade ——" Then I heard a carried on waves of high spirit toward the room. The two girls burst in laughing and shouting, "Here she is!" Lu stood in the doorway, waiting with ill-concealed joy and anxiety to hear us tell her how she looked. Her blue eyes sparkled with delight, and her slight bosom, under the lace of her white gown, heaved up and down with excitement.

My mother went over and kissed her on the cheek and said, "My dear, you look beautiful."

"What do you think, mother?" said Lu, turning to Aunt Elsie. "Will I pass inspection? Will I be a credit to you?"

Elsie had been standing quietly by the side of the bed with her hands folded. Again she reminded me of an Olympian goddess, cold and impregnable. She had just put on her gown and was intent upon the placket. She was very intent indeed upon the placket. Finally she looked up at Lu and said, "Of course you'll pass, dear. You always do." Then she added, "Lu, I want to talk to you for just a few minutes before you go to the church. May I?" Her voice had the sound of a command rather than a request.

"Of course," said Lu. "But we'll have to hurry. It's time to leave. What is it?"

Aunt Elsie looked around at all of us—Mrs. Saunders, Peggy, mother and the bridesmaids. She hesitated. "May we go into the other room?" she asked Mrs. Saunders.

I could not imagine what Aunt Elsie could have to say to Lu at a time like this, when everything had been settled. But I knew that Elsie had not been acting right. She was too calm. She reminded me of the old story of the spider and the fly. I know that Aunt Elsie has an inbred love for dressing up, for important occasions, for being the center of attention. It is a love which has been so starved that this wedding, where she would take her place as the mother of the bride, should have made her fluttery and excited, like a girl at her first ball.

A sharp shout came from the next room, a frantic, horrified shout of dismay. Without waiting to hear more, mother ran to its source, and I followed. We flung open the door and found Aunt Elsie lying on the bed, her hand over her forehead. Lu stood in the middle of the room, her face drawn into tight lines of tragedy.

We heard Elsie say, "I won't go. No one can make me go. You've all insisted upon going through with this thing against my will when you know that I'm sick and about to die. Now you've got to decide." Elsie was stretched out in a limp, exhausted pose on the bed, but her voice was remarkably hard and firm. "You can stay here with me. If you do that, you'll have all the love and devotion I can give you. But if you go to that church, I'll know you don't care whether I live or die." Her voice broke a little and she paused. "Then you'll know that I never want to see you again."

Lu ran over to her mother and, wailing, threw herself upon her. "You've got to come. Don't let me down now. People are all over there waiting. Get up and go with me." The bride-to-be was now a truly pathetic sight. She got up and pounded her fist against the bedpost. "Come on. Come on," she cried in a panic.

"Go yourself, if you don't care any more about me than that. But go alone," Elsie said in a voice that was at once faint and firm.

"But what'll people think!" exclaimed Lu. She had the same deep concern for public opinion that Elsie possessed. But Lu had some self-confidence, while Elsie thought that no one could have a very good opinion of her.

My mother darted forward and spoke sternly to Elsie. "Don't act like a child. You're wasting time. Snap out of it."

Elsie rubbed her eyes and stared weakly at us. "I can't," she said. "I'm too sick. I feel very ill. You can't leave me now."

"Oh, can't we!" said my mother. "Come on, Lu. You're going to get married this evening, and the wedding's going to go off on time." She pulled poor Lu toward the door, where we joined the group of women waiting for us with curiosity and impatience.

"Isn't your mother going?" they asked unbelievingly.

"She's too sick!" gasped Lu.

As we rushed downstairs, I heard a faint voice calling after us, "Lu! Lu!"

When we reached the church it was three minutes to eight. Richmond and all the ushers were having an anxious conference in the back of the chapel and gazing at their wrist watches with expressions of dismay. When they saw us come in, they were too relieved even to ask what had delayed us.

Only Richmond went up to Lu and whispered, "For Pete's sake, what's been keeping you? Say! Where's your mother?"

Lu had regained most of her self-control, but now she looked frightened and miserable rather than happy. "She wouldn't come. We couldn't make her come," she whispered back to her father. "She says she's too sick!"

A look of shocked but complete understanding shot into Richmond's big, friendly face. Then the wedding march began. I saw him squeeze Lu's arm, and he murmured, "Never mind, honey. They say it's good luck to be married on the upstroke of the clock."

We started down the aisle. The chapel was filled with people, but I was only subconsciously aware of them. They all seemed blended together in the haze of soft, evening church light, and the mixture of the people and the light had a poignant beauty which made me desperate at the thought of Lu's unhappiness. My eyes were fixed on the delicate altar with its stained-glass window of royal purples and blues. As I looked at the rich colors, they blurred and into them slipped the fuzzy, muddled images of a hurt Lu, a wrathful Elsie and whispering guests. Their figures mingled with the colors and distorted the window. Then the images disappeared, leaving the glass clear and beautiful as before.

We took our places at the altar, and the minister's clear voice filled the chapel. Lu and Art looked at him with wonder and gravity in their faces, and I saw with relief that both of them were lost to everything except the beauty of the moment. Only a trace of worry was to be found in the slight frown of Lu's eyebrows. Before long they had knelt before the altar, and the minister was saying, "Repeat after me ——" The timeless old vows floated across the church, Art's in a firm, low voice and Lu's in a soft soprano: "I take this woman . . . for better or for worse, for richer or for poorer, in sickness or in health . . . forsaking all others."

Cold Night

By Ina S. Stovall

At night, when roused by sudden chill,
Instinctively I start to rise
To see if under covers still
My children sleep, my anxious eyes
Quest through the dark to where each form
I earlier left, cocooned and warm,
Forgetting that they now are grown
And covering children of their own.

Back to my blanket's warmth I creep:
But not to sleep . . . but not to sleep!

I could not help hearing a slight murmur among the guests, no more perhaps than the rustle of their clothes, but yet a murmur. I looked over the heads of the congregation, and as my eyes swept to the back of the chapel I saw Aunt Elsie enter. Her shoulders were very erect, and she carried her head high as she moved quietly right down the center aisle of the church. She looked regal, but her face was expressionless. It was like a mask covering all her feelings. Only the slight droop at the corners of her lips suggested the punishment she was suffering. The heads of the people in the congregation turned toward her, and I heard someone near the front of the chapel whisper, "Her mother!" and someone else say, "Why ——" Aunt Elsie slowly walked the entire length of the aisle and took her place by Richmond in the pew reserved for the bride's parents.

She could have crept down the side aisle and sat near the back. No one would have noticed her, and she could have told people later that she'd been there all the time. But, in the middle of the ceremony, she had walked down the center aisle. This was a thing many people stronger than Elsie could never have done. In a strange way this aunt of mine was powerful.

"If any of you know any impediment why these two may not lawfully be joined together in matrimony, confess it now," said the minister. There was a lightning second of silence. I saw Elsie sit forward in her seat and clutch at the pew ahead of her, but the minister continued, "Lucille Sturges Meyer, do you take this man to be your lawful wedded husband?"

"I do," said Lu happily.

Elsie sank back into her seat. The moment had passed. I looked at Lu. Joy was expressed in the curve of her cheek and tenderness was in her lips. She was glad, glad to say good-by to an old life and start a new one. She was glad to be a Ventnor instead of a Meyer. Everything was golden to her. In a minute the couple were married, and we were walking back up the aisle to the strains of Mendelssohn's triumphal music.

At the reception after the wedding, Elsie was gracious and assured. She nodded, and shook hands, and pointed people to the refreshment table as if it were an accepted custom for her to be the mother of the bride. No one asked her why she had been late to her daughter's wedding. Instead, there was much talk about "How lovely Lu looks," and "She is so lucky. Art is a very promising young man," and to all this Aunt Elsie would only smile and say, "Yes, Lucille is very fortunate."

The week after the wedding our house was as quiet as it had been excited. The plans had been completed, the wedding had been accomplished, Lu and Art had gone to Minnesota on their honeymoon, and Uncle Richmond had returned to Montana, leaving our house as void of excitement as an empty carnival ground. For a month the question of Elsie's reaction to the wedding had made us all toss in our sleep. It had been like a fast-whirling wheel of chance which held our fascinated attention. Suddenly the problem vanished, leaving in its place only an empty space of sweet, unusual peace.

On such a peaceful Sunday afternoon Elsie sat at the piano in the living room. Her slim, quick fingers moved swiftly over the keys, and she swayed her body in time with the rhythm of the Minute Waltz. Her alert face had an intent, abstract expression often seen in musicians at work. I could not decide, as I watched her from the library, whether Elsie was thinking of Chopin or something entirely different. Suddenly she halted the quick, light notes and switched to the minor strains of Für Elise. Her fingers dragged on the keys. Soon the notes faded out altogether.

"Louise," she called softly.

My mother, sitting at the high secretary across the room, looked up. "Yes?" she answered.

Elsie rose from the piano bench and came over to the desk. "Did I tell you," she asked quietly, "that Mr. and Mrs. Ventnor are planning to come to Hillside in September?"

Mother laid down her pen and turned slightly around in her chair. "Are they coming just to see you?" she exclaimed.

"Well, I don't know," said Aunt Elsie. She sat down in the chair next to mother and leaned forward to talk to her. "Mrs. Ventnor told me at the wedding that they were going to spend their yearly vacation in the mountains. But you know as well as I do that the main reason they're coming is to visit us." Elsie's forehead puckered up into little wrinkles of worry at the prospect of this.

"Why, isn't that nice," said mother. "That will make things much more interesting for you."

Elsie flopped back into her chair, and her frown deepened. "Now that it's too late, they want to see what kind of a family their son married into. I can't say that I want anyone poking around inspecting the way we live."

"Let them inspect! You've been to their house. Besides, there is nothing to be ashamed of in the way you live." Mother picked up her pen again and began to write. I saw that she did not consider the subject serious.

Elsie got up and walked to the other side of the room, where she wheeled around to look at mother. "It's all very well to say, 'Let them inspect,'" she said in a strained voice, "but what will they think of a one-story cottage with dining-living room, bedrooms and kitchen all crammed together on the same floor?"

Mother looked up again with surprise in her blue eyes. "Elsie, people as well off as the Ventnors are not impressed by material possessions. At least, not if they're worth worrying about. The cottage can be charming if it's skillfully decorated—and neat. Be sure it's neat." I knew mother was referring to the summer when she visited Hillside and discovered that none of the beds were ever made before one in the afternoon. She could not tolerate slothfulness in housekeeping.

Aunt Elsie came over to the chair and sat down again. "You're perfectly right, Louise. I know that. But you haven't seen the cottage lately. The white paint is very dirty and peeling. And the front is not landscaped at all. It still has those same scrubby bridal-wreath bushes, and that's all. The back lawn is nice, but it doesn't have anything in it except just odds and ends." She was silent for a minute. Then she leaned forward and spoke again in the pseudocasual tone I have so often heard. "Of course the interior needs things done, too, but it's the exterior that looks the worst. You know, I was thinking that what the place needs most is to be painted and landscaped. I could get it painted for three hundred dollars and landscaped for a hundred and fifty."

Mother chewed the end of her pen and looked thoughtfully at Aunt Elsie. "If I thought this was to be done just for the Ventnors," she said at last, "I wouldn't think it important enough to worry about. But if the house actually does need painting and landscaping, why then ——" She broke off and became absorbed in a bit of mental arithmetic.

Elsie sat up erect and said, "Just for the Ventnors! I think it's important to do it just for the Ventnors. Don't forget they're our relatives now, and they've got to take care of my daughter. I think it's mighty important what they think, I'll tell you."

"Do you think a hundred dollars would take care of the paint?" mother asked. "A hundred ——" Mother's voice broke abruptly. She dropped her pen and clutched her breast. Her hand, suddenly trembling and anguished, ran frantically over her bosom, grasping and pulling the material in her dress. She clutched convulsively at the region around her armpits and above her heart. Aunt Elsie and I saw the color drain from her face, leaving her white and sick and old. "I—I ——" she gasped. She got up and began to run for the stairs.

Elsie jumped from her chair and ran after her. "Louise! Don't run. Stop!" Elsie commanded. She grasped mother's arm and pulled her to a stop. Her gray eyes were wide and full of concern as she supported mother and whispered to her, "Don't move. Ann and I will take you upstairs. Just move your legs a little, and we'll carry you upstairs." Elsie beckoned for me to put mother's left arm across my shoulder, and together we slowly lifted her upstairs, while Aunt Elsie whispered, "Try to relax. Easy now. Easy." She regarded my mother's colorless, contorted face with observant concern, and directed the way to the front bedroom.

By this time mother had lost the desire and the ability to move. She was limp and helpless, and it was with great difficulty that we lifted her dead weight onto the big double bed without jerking her. Aunt Elsie, however, moved with alert care and precision. The strained, stricken expression around her gray eyes and her awareness of everything about mother showed Elsie's sincere concern over this heart attack. My own terror at the suddenness of it became mingled with overwhelming gratefulness to Elsie for her cool, sincere interest. Now, for the first time since I had known her, I saw her forget herself entirely and direct every ounce of her energy to helping one whom she loved.

Within five minutes after I telephoned my father to tell him about the heart attack, he was home from the hospital and leaping up the stairs by twos and threes, his bag in hand. I met him at the front door and followed him upstairs, gingerly carrying some equipment he had motioned for me to take—a technical array of rubber and tin and glass fastened together and locked in a case. When I entered the bedroom, he turned brusquely to me and took what I was holding. Elsie and

I watched him fasten two electrodes to my mother's pale, slender ankles and one to each of her arms. Then we all waited silently to see what kind of action her heart would record on the electrocardiograph by her bed. The minutes that ticked by while we waited were the agonizing minutes before a sentence of either life or death. The movements of a dark line on a graph would make the difference between hope and despair. Finally my father removed the electrodes and studied the chart which had been made. When he first looked at it, I saw his stern, concerned face grow tense, and his blue eyes darken. Quickly he took out his hypodermic syringe, filled it with solution from a small bottle, and gave mother a shot in the arm. Then he barked at Elsie and me, "Undress her and get her under the covers. Don't move her any more than absolutely necessary. I'm going to call Doctor Hopkins over for consultation," and dashed out of the room.

When Doctor Hopkins had examined mother, he and father discussed her case in low tones, while Aunt Elsie and I sat on the other side of the room and listened. We were both thoroughly frightened. An illness which, in a second's time, takes a normal, healthy person to the very brink of death is so abnormally sinister that it passes understanding.

We heard father saying, "I'd like to get her to a hospital, but she's so badly off it might be fatal to move her."

The other man thought a minute and then said, "I agree with you, John. I think it's far more important that she be kept absolutely quiet."

Father studied my mother's pale face and the uneven movement of her chest beneath her white gown. "She doesn't need an oxygen tent. She won't need anything we can't give her here at home."

Doctor Hopkins gathered up the instruments he had used and moved out the door. My father accompanied him downstairs, talking in low tones. They spoke in technical terms, but it was plain enough for Elsie and me to realize that the chance of mother's recovery was slight.

From that day throughout the course of mother's brief illness, father canceled all his office appointments and cared only for those of his patients who badly needed attention. His afternoons were spent at home with mother, and, although no slight phase of her condition escaped his notice and thought, even he could do little for her.

THE morning after the fateful attack, however, contrary to expectation, mother was alert and cheerful. With the permission of father and the nurse, who had arrived the preceding afternoon, Aunt Elsie, Peggy and I went into her room for a brief visit. The color had not returned to her face; she still looked as if the sun had not touched her for a year. She lay straight in bed, her arms fixed to her sides as if they were immovable, and her hair white against the white of the sheet. The three of us stood in a rather silent row by her bedside and gazed fondly at her.

"How is it now? Better?" asked Aunt Elsie.

Mother smiled up at us. "You don't have to look so worried about me," she said. "I feel fine. I feel as if I'm going to be all right. Maybe soon they'll let me sit up in bed."

That day mother ate well, despite her motionlessness, and showed distinct signs of desiring companionship.

Elsie stayed close to her room and, whenever she was allowed, would go in to straighten the bedclothes, fluff up the pillows or regulate the ventilation. She was painfully aware that mother had been the one person in the world who loved her enough to exert every energy to help her. Mother had been the one person who cared enough for Aunt Elsie to buy clothes for her, to educate her daughter, to secure a home for her, to finance a wedding, to do everything within her power. Elsie seemed to feel that the ground she walked on would vanish if mother died. Was there anyone else who could love her so unselfishly?

This thought must have been foremost in Elsie's brain during those few days when she took command of the household prepared the meals, washed the dishes, dusted and cleaned. She painstakingly hunted downtown for light food which might be both suitable and attractive to mother. She spent the afternoons helping the nurse wash feeding tubes and heat liquids. All at once it was impossible for her to do too much. She became strong and tender and admirable.

Peggy, who always seemed to love her mother, appeared now to idolize her. She followed Aunt Elsie around the house, begging to be given something to do. When Aunt Elsie began to wash dishes, Peggy would help without being asked. Peggy was always ready to run downtown on an errand. She would peek into the room and then run over to Aunt Elsie and kiss her on the forehead, asking, "Anything to do?"

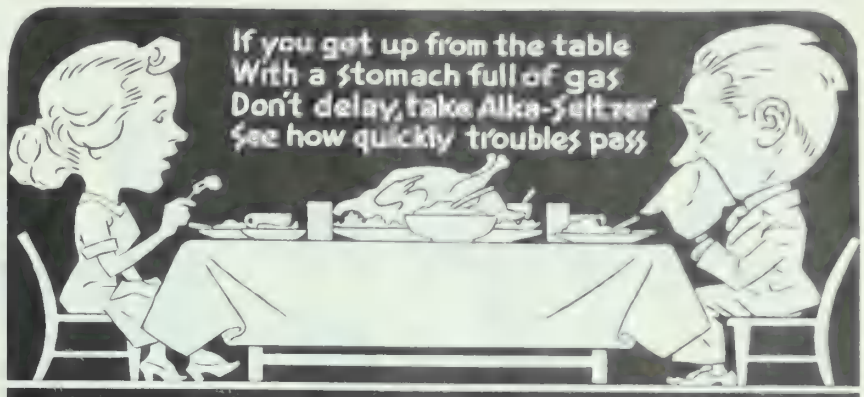
THERE was only too little to do. As several days passed, and I saw mother lie on her pillow still white, and old, and weak, it seemed to me that science was a bitter failure to have existed for thousands of years without discovering means of restoring her health. There was little to do except daily tasks—bathing, feeding and cleaning. The situation was, actually, in the hands of God.

This was a fact of which Aunt Elsie was greatly aware. The sixth day of the attack, as I sat darning socks in the living room, she came to me very much discouraged. She wanted to tell me what she had been thinking, and she sank down beside me on the couch.

"Ann," she whispered, "I'm sure all this is no use. You either get well from a heart attack or you don't. What are we going to do? No one can ever take Louise's place!" Aunt Elsie laid her hand on mine, as if asking me to reassure her. I felt her fingers tremble a little, and I knew that she was deeply concerned. Her voice had a tense anxiety in it that was more sincere and less dramatic than usual.

People who are too sharp cut their own fingers.
—PROVERB.

I became more frightened than I had been before, and I said abruptly, "Don't be silly, Aunt Elsie. Mother's going to get well. This is the first time she's been sick in years. She can't die."



"No, she hasn't been sick," said Aunt Elsie, "but she's never really been well." She pressed her forehead into the palm of her hand. I saw her close her eyes and murmur, "She's just kept going on and on, day after day, until she's worn out." Then Elsie opened her eyes suddenly. Abruptly she sat up and said, "But of course you're right. You're right." She straightened her blouse. "Why, all this is ridiculous," she said. "Just ridiculous. Nothing's going to happen to Louise."

Without warning Peggy ran quietly into the room, her blue eyes wide. She whispered, "Come quick to Aunt Louise. Uncle John's with her. Something's happening."

Quickly Elsie and I sped upstairs and tiptoed into the big bedroom. As usual, mother lay motionless in the center of the bed. Her eyes were closed, for she was in a coma, unable to hear or speak. Her delicate, lined face had suddenly turned blue, and her lips twitched spasmodically, while great drops of sweat rolled from her forehead and pasted her gray hair against the pillow.

Father, pale and excited, clutched the wrist of her limp, left hand. "No pulse," he said sharply to the nurse. "I can't feel her pulse at all."

Then mother's lips stopped moving. With a shock I noticed that the bedclothes were not rising and falling with the breath of her body. She was completely still. With that stillness death came into the room and held us spellbound and mystified. It had all happened in a minute. We did not move or make a sound, because we did not know what to say. We were full of unsatisfied curiosity and wonder at what had happened. Only my father broke away from the silence to fold her arms across her breast. Then, because I was her daughter, he came to me and put his arm around my waist. Aunt Elsie gasped, put her handkerchief to her mouth, and fled from the room.

Aunt Elsie hardly left her room for two days. She would lie prostrate on her bed for hours, alternately weeping and staring at the ceiling. It made her unhappy to see anyone but Peggy, and when she came to meals, she would sit quiet and downcast. Thus, instead of maintaining calm and helping with the work, she only served to make matters more difficult. Peggy reported that Aunt Elsie could not believe mother was really dead. She would ask her daughter, "How could she be? Is it possible?" The second afternoon I went up to her room to persuade her to take a drive with me, and I found her sitting on the edge of her bed studying her feet.

She shook her head in reply to my invitation, and said sadly, "Don't try to cheer me up, Ann. It will only make matters worse." Then she looked at me and said, "I suppose you think I'm taking this awfully badly, considering that for the last twenty-five years I've lived a thousand miles away from her. You'd be right if it were any brother or sister. But your mother wasn't any sister to me. She was the sister." She paused and looked at the floor, as if searching for more words. I knew that she had reached the point at which she had to "tell it to somebody," and I happened to be the one. "You've never had a sister, so you don't know what it can mean. You don't know what it's like to have someone your own age who will listen to everything you say, respect you in spite of everything, and help you whenever she can. I've lived a thousand miles from Louise, but she never seemed farther away than next door, because all my mail was from her and whatever was given to me was her gift."

Aunt Elsie looked at me, and I saw with shock that her face was tense and her gray eyes held deep fright. She looked almost ill. Running her fingers through her hair, she whispered:

"For the first time in my life, all the props have been knocked from beneath me. I have no support, nothing to stand on. I feel as if I'm sinking in quicksand, and there's no one to throw me a rope. All the other troubles before this seemed serious; but very deep inside I wasn't frightened, because I knew I had Louise. Now she's gone. She's gone. There'll never be anyone who loves me as much."

She lay down sideways on the bed, and her shoulders shook in an effort to produce tears which had been exhausted. Her neat coiffure was, for once, disheveled, and the make-up on her face was smeared and bleary. As I watched her, the last thing she had said ran through and through my brain: "There'll never be anyone who loves me as much."

Why, thought I, that has always been the trouble with Aunt Elsie! She continually thinks about having people love her. It has never occurred to her to concentrate upon loving other people. She has never realized that the more you give, the more you get. The higher a ball is thrown into the air, the harder it will hit the ground. The more you love, the more you are loved.

Aunt Elsie lifted her head from the bed and smiled weakly at me in a gesture of appeal. I did not smile back, because I felt nothing for her except pity and anger. The pity was for her inadequacy to cope with the world. It was in the back of my mind and kept my thoughts from my tongue.

But it was the anger which took possession of me so strongly that I could no longer watch her lying on the bed. I got up, walked to the dormer window and stared into the street. I thought of Aunt Elsie crying because mother was no longer here to take care of her. Elsie, who had not given mother a week's peace. Elsie, who must always have someone upon whom to depend. Mother had been to her like a car expected to run without being filled. Now, as a result, the machine had refused to move, and Aunt Elsie was unaware of the cause.

"You see, I'm not like most other people," Elsie said behind my back. I turned to face her, and she continued, "I've never had anyone in my immediate family I could put my faith in. Richmond is very sweet, but he has no backbone at all. Now he doesn't even care about me. Lu and I never could agree about anything. We've always been at swords' points. Peggy is a quiet, obedient child, but she has always been too little to talk to seriously."

We heard someone climbing the stairs to our room on the third floor. When she reached the landing, a soft voice called, "Mother, are you busy?"

"Speak of the devil!" I exclaimed.

In a minute Peggy appeared in the doorway, holding a big glass of lemonade in her hand. Her pretty blue eyes were smiling at her mother. "I made you some lemonade," she said, "and you've got to drink it." She looked severe, pulling her eyebrows together in imitation of the stern parent. "Don't say no, 'cause it's got vitamins in it. It's good for you."

Aunt Elsie took the glass and set it down on the bedside table. Her face lighted up with hope. "You angel," she cried. She seized Peggy playfully by the waist and pulled her down beside her on the rumpled spread. "Angel sweet, my darling. Do you love me?"

"'Course I do," said Peggy. "Doesn't everyone love their mother?"

"I hope so," replied Aunt Elsie. "I hope so. How much do you love me?"

Peggy's eyes became serious. She thought a minute. Then, with sincerity and obedience, she answered, "As much as anything in the world, I guess." THE END

BLOOD IS LIFE

Use of plasma and whole blood in Korea has saved the lives of many American boys. In World War I, 8 to 11 out of every 100 wounded died after reaching a forward surgical hospital. In World War II, the number was reduced to 4.5; in the Korean conflict, to 2.6 men per hundred.

The value of a reserve supply of plasma has been proved, yet it is one vital commodity that assembly lines cannot produce and money cannot buy. Plasma, a blood derivative obtained by separating red cells from human blood, is manufactured only in the human body.

The Department of Defense has asked the Red Cross to collect nearly 3,000,000 pints of whole blood this year. You may contribute blood through Red Cross Defense Blood or regional centers, or co-operating private blood banks.

TIGER IN THE CLOSET

measured water into a saucepan, added salt and put it on the stove to boil. She poured cereal into a dry measuring cup and stirred it into the boiling water. Then she fixed orange juice for herself and Gerry, and drank her own right away.

While the cereal cooked with slow plops, she sat at the kitchen table and sipped hot coffee. She looked at the clock. Maybe she could eat the rest of her breakfast before the boys awoke. It might help her. She spooned hot cereal into a bowl, added cream and sugar, toasted bread and buttered it, and poured herself another cup of coffee.

She just knew that the minute she sat down there would be an outcry from the boys' bedroom. There was. She sighed. They had an instinct for it. She was sure of it.

She put her untouched food into the warming oven and hurried to the boys' room. It was Eric. Gerry still slept. Eric beamed at her.

"Potty," he said. He was drenched.

"You bum. You might have waited," whispered Marian.

"Hi," said Eric, smiling with all his eight teeth.

"Hi, darling." She smiled back at him.

She turned off the night light, grabbed his clothes and a clean diaper from the top of the chest of drawers, and carried the baby by his fat middle to the big bed in the other room.

She worked mechanically, one hand undoing the pins while the other held the baby's right knee to keep him from flipping over. She fitted the clean diaper and carefully inserted a pin.

"Hold still, sweetie pie," she begged.

"Pie," said Eric, kicking. A spot of blood oozed from Marian's thumb and left a bright dot on the cloth.

"Froggie went a-courtin'," sang Marian.

Eric lay still and listened. "Time-o," he suggested, as she worked.

"Tee-mee time-o," she obliged with the nonsense chorus, à la Tex Ritter.

She felt the pins to make sure they were closed, then deftly slipped the squirming baby into his plastic pants, T shirt, overalls, socks and shoes.

"There." She lifted him up and held him close. "Kiss mamma," she said.

"No, no, no." He grinned coyly and pushed her face.

"Aw, come on," she begged.

"Aw, come on," he said carefully.

"Well, aren't you the talker. Are you hungry?"

"Hun-gry," said Eric, beating her on the chest and looking fierce.

"You tyrant." She squeezed him and kissed his warm fat neck and he squealed and giggled as they headed for the kitchen.

He sat in his high chair and ate a corner of her toast and watched her while she cooled his cereal and warmed his milk. She took her own breakfast out of the warming oven and placed it beside his on the kitchen table, and then she fed him with her right hand and herself with her left hand.

They smiled at each other. "Did you know I love you?" asked Marian, scraping cereal off his chin.

"A' shru," said Eric, pushing the spoon away. "Mee-ulk."

He drank an ounce or two of milk from the cup she held for him, then pushed it away and demanded his bottle.

He watched out the window as he sucked on the bottle she held, with her elbow resting on the high-chair tray. He let go the nipple.

"Po-enk." He pointed outside.

"Smoke," corrected his mother. "That's smoke from the neighbor's chimney. Can you say 'moke'? If you can say 'moke,' surely you can say 'smoke.'"

"Moke," obliged Eric.

She thought it over. "'Po-enk' is cuter, though," she decided. "You can say 'po-enk' if you want to."

"Po-enk," said Eric amiably. "Botto," he demanded. He grabbed and drank, his eyes rolling.

Marian sipped coffee and watched him. The nipple gurgled.

"A' shru." Eric pushed at the empty bottle.

She kissed him on his right ear, then took the bottle to the sink with the other dishes, rinsed them in cold water and set them aside to be washed later.

Shrieks rang out from the other part of the house. Gerry. She gave Eric a spoon to bang and ran.

Gerry stood in his crib. His big eyes stared at her and then at the open closet. She put her arms around him. He was trembling.

"What was that noise in the closet?" He clutched at her and peered over her arm.

"Let's find out."

She let the side of his crib down and he climbed out. They went into the closet together, hand in hand, and stood a moment in the dimness. Then she turned on the light. They looked around.

"Nothing in here but shoes and clothes and suitcases," said Gerry's mother. "What did you think it was?"

"It was a tiger. A great big tiger."

"Now what would a poor old tiger do in our closet?" asked Marian. "He'd get all tangled up in the clothes and stub his poor toes on the suitcases and have a miserable time."

"Well." Gerry dropped the subject. He went out into the room and looked at the other crib. "Where's Eric?"

Marian brought his shirt, overalls and shoes from the chest. "In the kitchen," she answered. "Come on. Let's get dressed." She listened a moment. Eric banged away with his spoon. As long as she could hear him, she knew he was all right.

MARIAN dressed Gerry down to his feet and then waited patiently while he struggled with socks and shoes. She tied the laces for him, washed his hands and face, brushed his hair, and then they headed for the kitchen.

"Hi." Eric smiled and waved his spoon at Gerry.

Gerry ignored him and watched Marian while she dished up the rest of the cereal from the pan and added sugar and milk. He looked at his bowl and then at Eric.

"Did Eric eat?"

"Yes," said Marian, running cold water into the pan and scraping it. "Eric and I ate before you woke up."

Gerry sat there a minute. Then he pushed his dish away. "I don't believe I want this cereal."

"All right," said his mother. "You don't have to eat it. I can give it to the birds." She started to fix his toast.

"Bird," said Eric, watching Gerry.

Gerry ate.

Marian spread butter and jelly on the toast, put it on a paper napkin and set it before him. Then she put soap powder and hot water into the dishpan, poured the cold water from the breakfast things and put them into the hot suds to soak, after which she lifted Eric from his high chair to his play pen in one corner of the kitchen. She gave him an old bent percolator, a strainer, a rubber dish scraper and a brightly colored ball. He threw the ball under the stove.

She got out the oil mop from the broom closet and cleaned and straightened the living room first. It was a nice day, so she decided to limit herself to beds, bathroom, dishes and dusting. (She saved most of her big jobs for bad days when they couldn't get outdoors.) Even so, after a night like last night, the worst yet, she didn't see how she'd make it. She felt almost as tired as if she hadn't slept at all. It had been so long since she had had a good night's rest. It wasn't so much the time she was up with Gerry. It was the hour or more she lay awake afterward, shivering with fatigue and nervousness and waiting for him to cry out again.

She went into the kitchen and gave Gerry his cups of milk and orange juice.

Just do one thing at a time, she told herself, and you'll get through. The fellow who first said that, she decided as she knocked over the sugar bowl, never was a mother. She scraped spilled sugar from the table into a dish and saved it aside for cooking.

You Know They're Good Because They're HEINZ

Gerry took a swallow of milk, set his cup down carefully and looked at Marian. "Mamma," he asked, "where did Eric come from?"

Oh-oh, birds and bees, thought Marian. I wonder how much he wants to know. "Babies come from inside their mammas. Eric came from inside me," she replied, "same as you did."

Gerry considered this. "How did he get in there?"

Marian leaned against the sink and looked at him. "He grew in there in a special place in my tummy. He was real teeny-tiny to start with. About this big." She measured with her thumb and index finger. "And then he grew and grew for nine months until he was so big." She indicated with her hands. "And then he was ready to be born, so he came out through a special place, and there he was, all ready for us to take care of and love. Same as you, my darling."

She absently turned and tested the dishwater with her hand, then wiped the suds off her fingers onto the dishcloth. Her eyes got big and excited, remembering.

"It's the most wonderful thing in the world, having babies," she told her little boy. "You were such a sweet, little, pink-and-white baby, with wet curls all over your head and your mouth open and yelling. I saw both you and Eric the very second you were born."

It was wonderful, she thought, the most wonderful thing I've ever done. It's all I've ever wanted out of life. She forgot her fatigue for a moment, thinking back.

She turned and started on the dishes. Gerry drank the rest of his milk, then quickly downed his juice.

"Ack bea-ter," begged Eric, reaching from his pen.

Marian opened a big drawer, took out the utensil and handed it to him.

"I want it, I want it!" yelled Gerry. He left the table and his chair fell over and he ran and took the beater away from Eric, who screamed in sudden fury.

"He had it first," said Marian, quickly drying her hands. She gently twisted the egg beater out of Gerry's clutching hands and returned it to Eric, who continued to sob as he hugged the retrieved plaything.

Now Gerry screamed and raged. He grabbed the play pen and shook it and kicked at it, and Eric teetered and sat down hard and almost fell over backward.

"All right, Gerry, that's enough," ordered Marian. "Now you go and sit in the living room until you can behave."

The little boy stopped yelling and just stood there and looked at his mother. Then he put his arms around her. "Mamma, kiss me," he begged.

"Kissing has nothing to do with it, Gerry," said Marian, kissing him. "I don't let Eric take your things and you're not going to take his."

"When I was a baby, I used to play with that egg beater," said Gerry.

MARIAN went back to the sink. "Yes, and you can still play with it when Eric is through with it."

There was a metallic crash and clatter in the back yard.

"There's the garbage truck," said Marian. "Grandma always used to joke and say, 'Tell 'em we don't need any.'"

Gerry didn't laugh. He stood on his chair and looked out the window. "When I'm a bigger man, I can drive that garbage truck," he stated.

"Of course you can," said his mother. "You can do anything you want to when you're a bigger man. Drive the garbage truck or be a cowboy or a fireman or a lineman or an engineer or a meter man or a plumber," she listed all his heroes.

His eyes shone.

"Truck," said Eric. "Ter-ruck," drawing it out the second time.

"Well, good for you," said Marian. "Eric said 'truck' because you said 'truck,' Gerry. You're teaching him how to talk."

GERRY turned and looked at Eric a moment. Then he got down from the chair, went to his toy cupboard and brought out one of his precious toy trucks. He thrust it through the play-pen slats at Eric.

"Here," he said, "here's a real truck."

Eric grabbed the toy and turned his back on them. He put the truck on its back and turned the wheels with one finger. Gerry half reached in to take it back.

"That's wonderful," admired Marian hastily. "You're a good brother. Eric's lucky to have such a nice big brother."

Gerry turned away from the pen and went to his cupboard for his sack of blocks. He dumped them on the floor and started to build. He made a long, irregular structure.

Marian dried the last of the silver into a drawer, closed it, emptied the dishpan, wiped it dry and hung it below the sink. She oil-mopped the kitchen floor, working carefully around Gerry.

"See what I made." Gerry looked up at her.

"That's beautiful." Marian leaned on her mop and looked.

"What is it?" he demanded.

"You tell me what it is," Marian said.

"What is it?" he insisted. "Don't you know?"

"Let's see. A ranch?" she guessed.

"No. It's a roundhouse."

"Why, of course it is. And those blocks there in a row are the train."

He looked at them. "Yes." He went on building.

Marian went out and shook the mop. When she came in, she left the kitchen. She made the beds, then mopped the bedrooms.

Eric threw all his toys out of his pen and yelled. She went and picked him up and turned him loose in the cleaned living room. After making sure there was nothing he could get into that he shouldn't, she locked the safety gates and left him there with a new set of playthings.

Then she went into the bathroom and quickly washed the fixtures with cleanser and pieces of old diaper. When she turned off the water in the basin, she listened a moment. She heard a tapping sound on the living-room window. She could hear Gerry's blocks still rattling in the kitchen. She went to look. Eric had climbed on the davenport and was hitting the window with his hand. He had never climbed before.

She opened the gate and started quietly toward him. Gerry suddenly came running and opened the other gate. When he saw Eric standing on the davenport, he yelled. Eric tried to get down, but lost his balance. Before Marian could reach him, he went off,

On Our Knees

By Dorothy Ashby Pownall

Thanks for these brooding hills;
the forest hush;
Houses with lamps alight; a muted song,
And children, murmurous at close of day.
Now, as we lift our hearts in grateful prayer,
Kneeling, say thanks for shelter and for food, Safety, and warmth against the winter's cold,
Give us, O Lord, compassion for the old;
Inspire in us the courage to be good;
Vanquish our terror, and let brotherhood
Invade those hearts locked hard in bands of hate.
Now, in November, grant to all the living
Grace to feel the comfort of Thanksgiving.

headfirst. His head hit the floor like a ripe melon.

Oh, dear God! Marian could hardly breathe. Eric lay there, his eyes wide with stunned surprise. Then he cut loose. Marian picked him up.

"Baby, baby, you're all right." She held him close and felt his head gently. She couldn't feel anything. Please, God, let him be all right, she prayed. Don't let anything happen to my baby. She looked closely at him, but he just screamed. I guess he's all right, she decided, or he couldn't move.

She sat down on the davenport with the sobbing baby and closed her eyes weakly. If anything ever does happen to my children, she thought, give me strength and courage to face it. And don't let me forget to pray, because that's the only thing that will keep me from going out of my mind.

I mustn't be afraid this way, she told herself. It's not fair to them or to me. But even so, she could not help the feeling that came into her heart at a time like this.

Eric suddenly discovered he was near the window again. He stopped crying. "Our car," he said. He tapped on the window. He hiccuped and sniffed. Marian wiped his face with a clean handkerchief from her pocket.

Gerry looked out. "No," he said, "that car belongs to the neighbors."

"Naymer," said Eric with another big sniff.

I must watch him closely for a while, thought Marian. If he acts sick, I'll have to call the doctor.

"Eric, you must stay down from here," she ordered. No, she decided, that won't work. She stood Eric on the davenport, his back to the room. "Come on, Eric," she told him, "show mamma how you can get down." She tugged on him gently. "Come down backward."

He ignored her.

"Come down backward!" demanded Gerry.

"Backerd," said Eric, tapping on the window.

He screamed when Marian pulled on his overalls and made him work his way down.

"All right now." She patted his bottom. "Now go right back up again."

He stopped yelling and looked at her for a moment in disbelief, then scrambled up on the davenport again. He fussed at her the next two rounds, but when he began to get the idea, he played the game with increasing skill. Gerry played, too, and that helped. Marian praised him for helping. She praised Eric for learning. When Eric became bored and turned to his toys, she left them.

She went to the kitchen and got two small oranges from the vegetable bin, washed and dried them, cut and squeezed them, then strained the juice into a cup. She took the cup of juice to Eric, who drank thirstily.

Gerry looked at her expectantly. It was time for their outing. She got their caps and sweaters from the closet, put a double diaper on Eric, gave Gerry a drink of water, dressed the boys for outdoors and handed them each a cooky. She went out on the porch and worked the stroller down the steps to the walk. Then she helped Eric and Gerry down. She put a safety harness on Eric and fastened him in the stroller. Then Gerry watched him and they ate their cookies while Marian went back and got her money and key and put on her own jacket and hat, checked the stove to see that it was out, snatched up a shopping bag and locked the door.

It felt good to be out. The air was cool but sweet and fresh with early spring.

They went the five blocks to the railroad yards where a freight train performed nicely. They waved to their friends the engineer and brakemen, who waved back.

"Ter-rain," said Eric happily, weaving back and forth in his stroller seat.

Gerry jumped around excitedly. "When I'm a bigger man, I can be a brakeman."

"Oh, yes." Marian put her hand under his chin and smiled at him. "And just think. You can ride in the caboose and watch over the whole train and eat and sleep in the caboose and travel all sorts of places." She and Gerry looked hard at the lovely red house on wheels and wondered what it was like inside.

One of the nice things about having children, thought Marian, you can stand around and watch all kinds of interesting things with them and nobody thinks anything of it.

They started back. Marian let Eric walk for a while. Instead of staying on the sidewalk, he stumbled and staggered along on the lawns.

"Rough country," said his mother, reaching out a steadying hand.

"Crunty," said Eric, pushing her away.

Marian laughed.

"Crunty," said Gerry, hobbling along in imitation of Eric. "When I was a baby, I used to say 'crunty,'" he told Marian.

"That's right. You sure did. You were sure a cute, funny baby."

They herded Eric along for two blocks until they came to the supermarket. He objected strongly when Marian fastened him in his stroller again, but quieted when they pushed through the door into the bright, busy, fragrant store.

Marian hung a wire basket over one arm. At the vegetable bins she chose a bunch of slim, young carrots and a green pepper which she gave Gerry to hold, and picked a small, firm head of lettuce which she placed in her basket. Then, steering the children carefully through the aisles, she quickly selected a can of pineapple juice, a large can of tomatoes and a small can of tomato paste, a package of spaghetti and a loaf of whole-wheat bread. From the reach-in refrigerator case she took a carton of milk and a box of cottage cheese. At the meat counter she asked for and got a half pound of the best ground beef and a nice slice of calf's liver.

Then she placed herself and the boys in the shortest line, was checked through in short order, paid for her groceries and stowed them in her shopping bag, and they finally found themselves outside again and headed for home.

They had three blocks to go. They saw two plump robins hopping on a lawn, children playing on porches, a small brown dog sniffing in the gutter, a water-sprinkling truck, and an old, old lady with an enormously fat, old, slobbery bulldog on a leash. And Gerry found a lovely faucet that someone had lost in the street. It was kind of battered, but it still turned on and off. It was a full morning.

Marian felt relaxed when they reached the house. The boys were hungry and quiet. Andy wasn't home yet. Sometimes he was late.

After putting away their outdoor wraps in the closet and the groceries in the pantry and refrigerator, she changed Eric, washed the boys' hands, and then gave them each a small cup of tomato juice and a cracker to tide them over until lunch was ready.

Then she took four eggs, a dish of butter and a carton of milk from the refrigerator, got two bowls from a cupboard and rescued the egg beater from under the stove and rinsed it off under the hot-water faucet. She broke the eggs and carefully separated the yolks from the whites, put a little salt in the bowl with the whites and some milk and a spoonful of sugar with the yolks, and proceeded to make a fluffy omelet for herself and the children. It was the only way she could get Gerry to eat egg.

While the omelet cooked, she got out plates, filled cups with milk, opened a can of applesauce and spooned it into saucedishes, set a plate of graham crackers in the middle of the table and warmed Eric's bottle.

As before, she managed her own meal with her left hand while the right took care of Eric.

Gerry finished his lunch first, then sat on Marian's lap while she gave Eric his bottle. Eric let go the nipple, squealed and tried to push Gerry away.

"Listen, I got my rights around here," declared Gerry firmly, pushing back.

Eric finally gave up and went back to his bottle.

Gerry snuggled close to Marian. She put her mouth against the fine hairs at the back of his neck, blew on them, kissed him and whispered, "I love you, I love you, I love you."

He giggled and squealed and squirmed happily. He looked up at her impishly. "Mamma, I don't love you," he teased. "I don't love you, mamma."

Marian knew her cue. "Oh, boohoo," she pretended to cry, "my little boy doesn't love me."

"I love you, I love you!" yelled Gerry, and he gave her sweet little smacking kisses on her left cheek, then she kissed him again, and Eric watched them while he drank from his bottle, but he didn't try to interfere any more.

When Eric pushed his bottle away, she set Gerry down, kissed both boys, then put the lunch dishes in the sink and ran cold water over them and left them to soak. Eric rocked back and forth in his high chair, chanting, and suddenly fell asleep. When she put him to bed, he woke up and churned around in his blanket for a while. He acted fine. Marian could find no sign of a bump or bruise on his head. Somehow they survived in spite of themselves.

In a few minutes he was asleep again, sprawled on his tummy, hugging the blanket and beginning to snore faintly. She tucked a light blanket over him and caressed his soft, fine hair a moment. He's a wonderful baby, she thought. Nothing seemed to bother him for very long. No tigers in his closet. Not yet.

Then she and Gerry took off their shoes and lay down on the big bed on top of the spread and she read to him. Stevenson today. She knew he didn't understand all the words, but he loved their music. She read well and with enthusiasm.

Gerry laid his face against his mother's shoulder and put an arm across her. "Mamma," he said drowsily, "did you know you loved me?"

Marian smiled and turned her head and kissed him. "Yes, my darling," she told him, "I love you very much."

Man has always been handicapped. Compared with other creatures, he is physically weak, he is menaced by a host of enemies, threatened by cold and famine, drought and storm. Because of this he learned to conquer the earth's resources and to subdue all other creatures; to protect himself, and to be sheltered, warm and fed. Man is a puny creature whose very weakness has compelled him to become the master of the earth. He had to make this conquest to survive at all, and so he made it.

Now, having mastered the earth, it is required of him that he master himself; that once again his weakness, his insufficiency shall goad him to his new achievements.

That is the way it always was. Attainment comes through what we do with means inadequate to gain our ends. Thought would never have reached its noblest powers of flight if from the beginning it had been winged. Language would never have overflowed into poetry if it had not stammered when it overtaxed itself in prose. Longing would always have been madness if it had not surpassed itself in love. Man would never have been man if, in a world unknown and full of mystery, he had not struggled until he grew a soul.

It is what we do not have and reach for—what we do not have and reach beyond—that turns our shuddering into boldness and audacity, and kindles our earthiness to flame. It is out of our weakness that we learn what to do with strength; it is because, when we most desire to speak, our speech is faltering, that what begins as broken utterance ends as prayer.

After 25—drying skin begins to show...

Flaky dry skin patches on your cheeks, rough up your skin, spoil your make-up's smooth look.

To Correct—Work into your cheeks nightly plenty of Pond's Dry Skin Cream. Swirl its softening help from chin-line up in front of ears. This lanolin-rich cream is homogenized to soak in better. Use a light film of this special cream under your make-up for day softening also.

These pictures show where drying skin on your face is most noticeable—and what you can do to help correct it!

Criss-Cross Lines Under Eyes will print themselves in, if your skin is dry, papery.

To Smooth—Be sure to cream-over those tiny dry lines nightly with lanolin-rich Pond's Dry Skin Cream. Start from outside corners of your eyes and tap cream very gently inward under eyes to nose. Feel, see how your dry, papery eye skin soaks up this cream's moistness.

Little Creases Settle By Earlobes when your skin begins to get dry and inelastic.

To Flatten Out—Use first two fingers of each hand and make "U-turns" with lanolin-rich Pond's Dry Skin Cream back and forth under your ears. Cream from front of ears, under, then up in back. This helps flatten little dry-skin creases, keeps skin soft, resilient.

It's noticeable... the way skin begins to look drier after 25.

The trouble lies in the skin itself!

From 25 on, the natural oil that helps keep skin soft, pliant and young-looking starts decreasing. Before 40, skin may have lost as much as 20% of its own softening oil. And—without enough oil, your skin will seem to shrivel—tiny dry lines will start to show up where you don't want them!

But you can offset this drying out—by giving your skin an oil especially suited to its needs. You can use a dry skin cream that is extra rich in lanolin, which is very like the oil of the skin itself—this special rich cream is Pond's Dry Skin Cream.

See its effects on your skin. At night—work it in thoroughly for special softening. By day—use it lightly for a smooth look under your make-up. It brings your skin a softer, fresher, younger look immediately.

Be sure you get this wonderful help now.

MRS. ERNEST L. BIDDLE says: "I find Pond's Dry Skin Cream is perfect softening care for dry skin. It's an indispensable cream for me."

THE DUCHESS OF RUTLAND says: "I've never known a cream to soften skin so beautifully as Pond's Dry Skin Cream. I find it a delightful help."

That Matronly-Looking Sagging starts so unpleasantly to show along your chin-line.

To Tone Up Chin-Line—Use thumb and first finger of each hand and "pinch along," from point of chin to up in front of your ears, with lanolin-rich Pond's Dry Skin Cream. This treatment brings circulation up, and gives this dry skin the lift and rich lubrication it needs.

Thread-like Dry Lines on Forehead can dig unattractive little furrows to age you.

To Help Erase—Use a firm stroke to circle lanolin-rich Pond's Dry Skin Cream thoroughly over your dry forehead skin. Pay special attention to skin at temples where little dry lines fasten on you. A special emulsifier in this rich cream gives your dry skin extra-softening help.

3 features make this cream effective

1. Rich in Lanolin—very like the skin's own oil
2. Homogenized—to soak in better
3. Special Emulsifier—for extra softening aid

Start this remarkable correction of your Dry Skin today

See on yourself how the use of this wonderful, rich cream promptly helps relieve skin dryness. How it helps combat loss of skin-softening oils . . . leaves your skin feeling softer, looking so much fresher and prettier.

You can be lavish when you use Pond's Dry Skin Cream—it is so sensibly priced—55¢, 31¢, 15¢, and 98¢ for the generous biggest jar (all plus tax).

Gerry slept. I must do the dishes and diapers, Marian decided. She dozed. In five minutes her own snoring woke her. She felt terrible. She lay there for five minutes more, watching the sleeping boy, then got up and put on her shoes and went to the kitchen, where she made herself a cup of hot tea with sugar and milk. She sat at the kitchen table long enough to drink the tea. Then she got busy.

After putting Eric's diapers to soak in a small tub of hot suds, she slapped up the dishes, then quickly rinsed the diapers in two waters, put them in the diaper pail, added fresh hot water and set them on a back burner of the stove to boil.

Next she scraped the carrots, washed and sliced them into a saucepan, added cold water, and put them to cook on the other back burner. She scrubbed two small, perfect potatoes and left them on the drainboard.

On one of the front burners she set the sterilizer full of washed baby bottles, and on the other she prepared a spaghetti sauce in an aluminum skillet.

She had just hung out the diapers to dry when Gerry stirred and called to her, so they sat on the davenport and she read to him again.

Eric was still asleep when Andy came. He walked in with a small open box under one arm and a broad smile on his face. He bent down and kissed Marian and Gerry. Gerry danced around him.

"Well, I've got it, dear," announced Andy.

"Got what?" Marian smiled at him. "The crown jools?"

"Better than that," he stated. "Sleep."

He set the box down on a chair and carefully lifted out a kitten and put it on the floor. It was a very small, striped kitten. The most beautiful kitten in the world.

"Oh," said Marian.

Gerry sat on the floor at a safe distance and looked at that kitten.

"His name is Tiger," said Andy.

"Of course," said Marian.

He ruffled the kitten's fur with one finger. "He's pretty young. It was probably stretching a point to take him from his mother. But he had to be like that." The kitten staggered a little and mewed faintly.

"Naturally," said Marian.

"Here, Tiger," whispered Gerry, not moving. "Here, Tiger." The kitten yawned and showed needle-sharp white teeth and a small pink tongue.

Marian looked at the kitten and at Gerry. Then she looked at her husband. "You're wonderful," she told him. "You're a natural-born father."

Andy beamed. "Oh, well," he said. "I guess it was kind of an inspiration at that," he admitted. He got brisk. He took off his coat. "How about a saucer of warm milk for Tiger?"

MARIAN got some. Tiger drank. He slopped milk on the floor and put his feet in the dish. Gerry just sat and looked. Looked and looked. The kitten finished the milk, licked its feet uncertainly, then lay down and went to sleep.

"Whose is he?" asked Gerry of no one in particular.

"He's yours," declared his father. "All yours and nobody else's."

Gerry thought it over. "Not Eric's?" he asked slowly.

"Not Eric's, not mamma's, not mine. He's yours," Andy repeated.

"Oh," said Gerry. He didn't move. He didn't even try to touch the cat. Not yet. He just looked.

Marian got a fairly old sweater of Gerry's, so that the kitten would know whom he belonged to, and they made a bed for Tiger in a box in the kitchen. Next to it they put a low box of sand, but that was just wishful thinking. Still, cats can be trained pretty early, certainly earlier than babies, thought Marian wryly, laying newspapers around the boxes.

Supper was pretty late, but nobody cared except maybe Eric.

"Tupper," he demanded, banging his high-chair tray.

"Supper," corrected his mother, beginning to feed him as they all sat down to the table. "Sssssupper," she drew it out.

"Oh, let the little fellow say 'tupper' if he wants to," said Gerry grandly, his spoon halfway to his mouth. "He'd rather say 'tupper.'"

"Tsupper," compromised Eric, his mouth spilling food.

"He's really trying," said Marian.

They all smiled at Eric. He blew chopped liver and baked potato at them, shouted "Naughty!" and kicked his heels against the footrest of his chair.

Let's see, thought Marian, what all do I have to do before I can take my bath and crawl into bed? Change Eric, wash the dishes, fold diapers, just a sponge bath for Eric as he had a regular bath last night. Andy will help with dishes and undress Gerry and they'll put the toys away. I guess I can make it. I always do.

IT was bedtime. Gerry had spent the evening in the kitchen. At last he had held the baby Tiger in his lap as he sat on the floor, and whispered to him.

Marian could hardly keep her eyes open. I wish I could sleep for two days straight, she told herself. Her back ached. Her feet hurt. Her head spun. For the first time I feel as if I'm beginning to get old, she decided. She was thirty-one and looked not a day more than nineteen.

She bent over Eric as he lay naked under a towel on the big bed. Under him were a rubber sheet and a large towel. By the bed on a bench were a basin of warm water, two soft washcloths, a bar of baby soap in a saucer, a bottle of baby lotion and a jar of baby cream. At the foot of the bed Marian had placed Eric's sleepers, a clean shirt and double diaper. She worked rapidly and automatically. Andy stood at the foot of the bed and watched.

Eric squealed and kicked and arched his back and tried to turn over. He was only playing. He loved to go to bed.

"I'd as soon work with an octopus," Marian told him, holding his right knee as she sponged him off.

"Ningin, ningin, ningin," chanted Eric happily, grabbing for his feet.

"Pattycake," begged his mother.

Andy went around to the head of the bed. "What's going on?" he asked the baby. He brought out his watch.

"What goin' on," said Eric smartly.

"Isn't he wonderful?" marveled his mother, patting him dry.

She smoothed him with lotion and cream and began to work him into his clean clothes. After she had stuffed Eric into his sleeper pants, Andy left his post by the bed and went down into the basement to fix the furnace for the night.

"Dere," said Eric, as Marian lifted him up.

She sat on the edge of the bed and cuddled him in her arms, and he lay there quietly while she began to sing a lullaby.

Gerry came in. He walked into the other bedroom, went into the unlighted closet and closed the door.

Marian sang softly. Eric blinked and sucked his thumb.

After a minute or two Gerry came out. He stood in the bedroom doorway and looked at his mother.

Marian stopped singing.

"I told him I liked him," said Gerry.

"Who?" asked Marian.

"The tiger."

"Oh? And what did he say?" his mother asked.

"He didn't say anything," said the little boy. "He's gone." THE END

"We live by the Journal"

A friendly knock on our editorial door (via letter) begins a visit with the Raymond A. Hills, of Westminster, Maryland

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: My devoted passion for the LHJ is, I believe, just a natural woman's love for something womanly. I decided when I read my first "Candy and Bill" story that my first girl would be called Candy regardless of what last name might follow. Your cover family, Mother and Daughter, have always been my favorites. When they started knitting little things, so did we. When they got a boy, we were certain we would too. We did—just twenty-four days later.

Our first home was one furnished room in a farmhouse in Maryland. Later when we took over some of a fourteen-room farmhouse—a part of which had been built over two hundred years ago—we dragged out back issues of LHJ and devoured ideas for doing something for next to nothing. It was during this time, struggling along on a brand-new engineer's salary, that we argued with your How America Lives budgets.

We had very little social life that year—in fact, none. It was the next spring that we decided to have an outdoor party and roast a suckling pig over an open barbecue pit. Raymond built a mortared outdoor fireplace. We were all set to go when we found out that our town's most famous cook had never cooked a whole pig. In desperation, I wrote to your food editor—how thrilled I was to get an air-mail special just in time. Needless to say, the party was a complete success.

That year, we put up over 500 jars of foods. We exhibited some in one of the local fairs and won two "blues." A big day for us—to beat the country folks at their own game.

In late '49, we led both our college classes in infant productivity. We think we still hold the title. Candy, Terry and Debby—7, 5, and 4—and Brian, born last July—these are our kids, plus a pet duck and one turtle.

Of course we think we have the most wonderful daddy in all the world. Lately, he has been made captain of the Westminster National Guard unit, and his duties have taken up much of his free time. His regular position is Plant Engineer at Congoleum-Nairn, Inc.

I make all the kids' clothes, most of my own, and pajamas and neckties for Raymond, on my new sewing machine.

Writing is not my forte, but it's been fun telling you this. We live by you and your ever helpful editors. Yours devotedly,

JANE S. HILL.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

A mother-and-daughter scene from real life—Mrs. Hill clears away last-minute mending preparatory to hospital trip "to get the new baby." Debby, four, is a lively, feminine charm-full, with weighty problems of her own.

BY BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN

SOMETHING momentous was afoot in the small white house at 14 New Windsor Road, Westminster, Maryland. The porch was almost impassable because of tricycles, toy trucks, small fry and dogs; the phone rang and the screen door banged almost continuously; and Grandmother Hill, a handsome blonde in spike-heeled sandals, was in a lather of activity.

In the kitchen a hurried penciled notation on the wall—"18 cups cherries, 31½ cups sugar"—hinted at the abruptness of young Mrs. Hill's departure to the hospital five days before. Mrs. Hill, Sr. (whom everyone calls "Honey") checked over the preparations for the evening. Supper stood all ready on the range, plates of hors d'oeuvres were stacked in the refrigerator to protect them from the wilting midsummer Maryland heat. The house was tidy, and in the front bedroom beside the huge double bed custom-built to accommodate Raymond Hill's gangling 6'4" frame, stood a small crib freshly made up for the new arrival.

A neighbor's child came banging in the front door. "Is the new baby going to die?"

Honey wiped her face with her apron and hushed him up.

"Well, the last one did," the child remarked complacently.

Honey was relieved when she realized that the three Hill grandchildren on the front porch couldn't possibly hear him:

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Baby due or not, it's Terry's fifth birthday. Jane will tell you he's a "wild little terror"—but she was up at 6:30 to bake cake, fix it up Western style.

Bathtime bedlam is supervised (and slightly encouraged) by father when National Guard duties allow. Mrs. Hill, Sr. ("Honey"), lends a helping hand during Jane's hospital stay.

Brian, age one half hour, takes back seat for a very special moment. Jane knew baby would be a boy because (feminine logic) "Terry needs a playmate."

"So far we've been accumulating children and equipment. There doesn't seem to be anything left for savings."

Getting bitten by dogs isn't all Terry does. He empties trash, aids with wash.

she collapsed into a chair. It had been quite a week. She remembered the day Jane, her daughter-in-law, had started into labor. It had been, of course, the hottest day in the world. But in spite of Jane's size and the perspiration streaming down her face and matting the ends of her long, sleek blond hair, she looked as pretty and animated as ever.

Up at 6:30 A.M., Jane had mixed and baked three separate batters for a birthday cake for Terry, aged five. While the cakes baked, she sterilized twenty-one pint jars for cherry jam and began to prepare six quarts of raspberries. She then hustled down to the egg auction for her weekly supply of eggs and squeezed in a visit to the new house the Hills are renting, since their present one will soon be sold. The new house needed new flooring, complete plastering, new wiring, paint and wallpaper, but Jane didn't seem at all perturbed about moving in with the new baby in five weeks. In eight years of marriage, she and Ray have been separated by war for three years, produced five children and moved eight times.

In the afternoon, Jane decorated the birthday cake, a three-layer rectangular affair, with chocolate and green icing and plastic cowboys, horses and fences. "A ranch house!" exclaimed delighted Terry. Fourteen of his friends were coming for a supper party to roast hot dogs outdoors, hunt for peanuts and shoot off firecrackers. In the midafternoon, Jane began to get a backache and started to pack for the hospital.

For herself, she packed a few shorties and bed jackets, two small white satin pillows for her elbows, plus every bit of cosmetics she owned—lipsticks, eye shadows, eyelash curlers, face creams, nail polish—some whodunits to read and some dress material to smock for Deborah. For the baby she tucked in the same little blanket, dress and silk sack (now dyed and carefully pressed and mended) that each of her four other children wore home from the hospital. She cried a little as she unwrapped a pink-and-blue giraffe and some tiny baby rattles. They had been in the crib the night Bruce died.

The biggest thrill of the coming delivery was that she had a spinal block, and for the first time actually saw her baby being born. A moment later the doctor dangled before her eyes a beautifully formed, lobster-red, lustily howling son and Jane burst into tears.

Candy, a winsome and very mature seven, is old hand at welcoming babies to the family, prefers reading, drawing to domestic chores (but does them anyway). Terry knows Brian was ordered specially for him, is a little awed.

Debby always washes her hands before touching Brian, doesn't like for him to cry. "Too lazy to get the gas off his tummy," Jane analyzes, picking him up. Crying ceases. "Or maybe," she amends with a smile, "he's just spoiled."

The first two days she was away, all went well at home with grandma and the three children. The next day Deborah, four, ran a temperature, and Terry, five, and Candy, seven, complained of stomach-aches. By the next night Debby had a real case of tonsillitis and a temperature of 104°. Honey was up every hour all night fussing with the benzoin steamer since Debby, whenever she gets sick, suffers from asthma.

She was still in bed with a temperature of 102° and the two others had sore throats. Well, reflected exhausted grandma, in five minutes their parents would be home and her responsibilities would be over.

A blood-curdling scream sent her racing to the porch. The cocker spaniel was cowering in a corner; Terry's face was a flood of blood and tears. "Bingo bit him!" Candy told her excitedly.

And that is why, when the proud parents and new baby arrived home a few minutes later, they were welcomed with the news that Honey had raced into the street and flagged down the first car she saw, yelling instructions to Candy to take care of sick Deborah, as she and the profusely bleeding Terry tore off to the nearest doctor for bandages

Full of vim after Brian's arrival, Jane returns to cooking, sewing she loves. "Ray likes a change—hates routine. And I like to try out new recipes. Works fine," she says, adding that despite budget worries, "we won't stint on food."

Because "you just can't be selfish when there are children," Jane thinks they are best thing for a marriage. She wants eight, will settle for six. Ray is firm disciplinarian, but "the kids adore him."

Debby never skips the two o'clock (P.M.) feeding. Looking ahead, the Hills expect she will skip college, marry early. If Candy and boys want college, fine, but Jane and Ray feel they should share costs.

Family fun is an everyday thing for the Hills, with swimming, berrypicking at top of list. Jane is excited about Ray's new promotion to Plant Engineer at Congoleum-Nairn's Cedarhurst plant. "It means we can start saving, at last."

and stitches. Grandma's beautifully prepared home-coming dinner was finally removed from the range at 10:30 that night and, what's more, eaten by the whole starved and exhausted crew.

A week later, Terry had his bandages removed and the scars were healing nicely. Jane was bouncing around in a pair of very abbreviated purple shorts (size 12) looking far more like a fashion model than a nursing mother. The new baby, Brian O'Donovan Hill, was placed in the noisiest spot in the house, following Jane's theory of toughening 'em up early. He slept happily between feedings at his mother's breast, a scant ten feet from the banging front screen door as the Hill children and their playmates dashed yelling in and out. Honey departed for home and Jane's parents, her sister, brother-in-law and their four-month-old daughter arrived and were somehow telescoped into the tiny three-bedroom house.

"Ray and I are just crazy about new little babies," Jane said, mopping her streaming face. "And I love being pregnant, if only the father would carry it around the last six weeks."

From Jane's point of view, it was entirely fitting that during all this hubbub, she was also hostess to several JOURNAL editors and a candid photographer. The JOURNAL has always played a large part in Jane's life. "Until recently, whenever the JOURNAL arrived, I'd take off the entire day—never even did the beds or dishes—and read it cover to cover. My friends would phone and say, 'Sorry to bother you, Jane, I presume you're flat on your back with the new JOURNAL.' Now I force myself to read it piecemeal."

Ray insists this is fun, quickly adds, "Unless I'm tired." Jane, thinking of new garage and Ray's hobby, sighs, "He's liable to buy another old car."

Never mind tomorrow

Now is the time to do it. If you'd be proud to bake a cake like this for dinner tonight, there's no reason in the world why you shouldn't. All it takes is Pillsbury White Cake Mix in the neat blue-and-white package. All you add is milk (and a bit of chocolate and sugar).

And your own cake can be just as moist and fine-grained, just as eye commanding, just as praise provoking as the cake that looks out from this page. It doesn't take any practice. You can do it today. Or you can do it tomorrow. But never mind tomorrow. How about today?

Marble Cake. Melt 1 square chocolate with 2 tbsp. sugar. Pour ⅔ of Pillsbury White Cake Mix batter into pans. Add cooled chocolate to remainder. Pour over batter in pans; cut through with knife.

Just add milk—

These are complete mixes. Milk is all you add—no eggs, flavoring or extras of any kind required.

GENEVIEVE NAYLOR

It's hard to believe this slim, appealing couple have ever had a worrisome thought about their figures. Actually, 6'4" Ray Hill recently dieted away 20 pounds of excess weight to reach his present and perfect 207 pounds. And Jane, 5'3" and the mother of four bouncing youngsters, maintains her premarriage weight of 118 pounds by means of intelligent (restrained) eating habits.

MY HUSBAND'S DIET . . . keeps me slim, too

GETTING Ray Hill to embark on a reducing diet was a challenge to his wife, Jane, who wanted to keep her husband healthy—as well as handsome! Most men rebel against such "feminine nonsense" as an insult to their egos and their appetites. It is possible, of course, that your husband remains lean and hard despite your good home cooking. It is possible, too, that your own weight is close to ideal. But recent and reliable medical reports tell us there are fifteen million men and women in this country whose obesity is a threat to their futures. For those of you who would like to avoid—or correct—such a hazard in your own home, the JOURNAL has planned a special husband-wife reducing diet. It is low in calories, yet hearty enough in portions to satisfy and slenderize any prominently padded adult. Follow it for better health!

Pep Without Pounds

Your husband, with his naturally larger frame (and appetite), will be happier with a diet that is heartier than yours. Here is a way each of you can determine the number of calories you require, as suggested by our own nutrition expert: Add up the calories you normally consume each day. (The diet chart on the opposite page, plus the calories listed under Forbidden Pleasures, can be your guide.) Divide the total number by two. For example: If your normal daily diet adds up to 2400 calories, then your reducing diet should add up to 1200. Your husband may find that his weakness for extra helpings, cream sauces or fancy desserts has brought his calorie count up to 3600. In that case, an 1800-calorie diet should provide a rapid and reliable means of reducing his waistline and renewing his energy! Remember, you are not cutting quantities of food in half. You are simply parting company with the extra calories that add the extra pounds!

Be Fair—Be Faithful

The diet that follows contains approximately 1200 calories a day in foods that are abundant in vitamins, minerals and proteins. It can be followed indefinitely. For the average woman these foods should provide for her daily energy output and, at the same time, allow her to lose weight at the rate of about two pounds a week. If you find you must amplify on this for yourself, as well as your husband, do so by increasing portions of the foods listed on the diet. Forbidden pleasures are forbidden here, if you are really interested in becoming the streamlined couple you were meant to be!

Forbidden Pleasures

Here are the kinds of everyday "extras" that double your calories and prompt your extra weight. At breakfast, for instance, you may be presently having cream in your coffee (1 tablespoon, 30 calories) . . . sugar in coffee (1 teaspoon, 20 calories) . . . an extra slice of generously buttered toast (120 calories) . . . preserves (½ tablespoon, 50 calories). At luncheon: mayonnaise on your sandwich (1 tablespoon, 100 calories) . . . a piece of chocolate cake or apple pie (1 slice, 300 calories). At dinner: gravy for your meat (2 tablespoons, 100 calories) . . . French or Russian dressing for your salad (1 tablespoon, 75 calories) . . . berry pie or chocolate ice cream (350 calories). Count them up—they total 1145 calories, or what an average diet might contain complete!

$100 Wardrobe

"THE CLOTHES I WANT MOST after my baby comes are clothes that will give me a pretty figure," said pretty Jane Hill. "A dress for dancing with a full skirt and a tiny waistline . . . a slim pair of velveteen slacks . . . a pretty tweed suit, and, for a pet extravagance, a jeweled sweater." We splurged on the tweed for her suit—$7.95 a yard. However, the fine quality 39″ rayon taffeta cost less than $1 a yard. Careful shopping for fabrics makes $100 go a long way. "Just the place to try out my pet JOURNAL ideas," she suggested. "Tall bookshelves, my old (Continued on Page 246)

Young Hills organize playthings for moving.

Moving Day at the Hills

By MARGARET DAVIDSON

"MOVING day is bedlam, of course." Jane Hill has survived five moves in five years. "As soon as I know the new address, I write friends and change magazine subscriptions."

■ Post-office change-of-address cards speed sending notices. Don't forget insurance companies, stores with charge accounts, banks, motor-vehicle and driver-registration bureaus, and Selective Service Board (if applicable).

■ Take the doctor's and dentist's advice about their successors.

● Call the school board to transfer the children's records and credentials.

● Be a newspaper and string saver. In addition, the Hills prompt their grocer to save lemon crates and cartons. These, plus Ray's foot lockers, are mainstays when packing. To these supplies add labels, black crayon and strong twine for marking and packaging boxes.

● Arrange for a mover. The Hills trusted the careful handling of a man who helped before. Starting from scratch, ask about types of service and estimates. These range from mere delivery to complete packing and moving. The Hills elected to pack all but fragile china, and to move many things themselves in the station wagon.

■ Pianos are temperamental and must be handled by experts.

● Mover-packed goods usually are automatically covered by insurance. Ask about coverage for all household effects.

● Move on paper first. If possible, measure rooms, or get a plan of the new house. Figure where belongings fit. Follow through with labels (colored for different rooms) and movers will put possessions in position. Saves wearisome hoisting later.

As the Date Nears

■ Drawers of chests are fine for folded bedding and clothing, but not for loose heavy things.

■ Send clothing, household furnishings and rugs to be cleaned, with directions for delivering or sending to the new address.

■ Budget-minded folks take down pictures, racks and removable fixtures. It cuts time of hourly-paid workers. Leave beds assembled, leave to experts.

■ Thirty average books in a box is one man's load. Keep in mind when packing.

■ Plates crack less easily if packed on end. Recommended for china and glassware are wood barrels, lined with excelsior, straw or shredded paper. Wrap plates separately and arrange spoke-fashion. Fill center with wrapped cups, serving dishes and the like. Pad the whole solidly.

■ Choose strong boxes for kitchen utensils and gadgets. Wrap in paper and put heaviest at the bottom. Tie together mops, brooms, curtain rods and such.

■ Be ruthless, toss out unimportant supplies from medicine chest and cosmetic shelf—particularly liquids. Use cellophane tape to secure tops on others. Pad well with paper, put in a strong carton and label "Breakable." Never move anything inflammable.

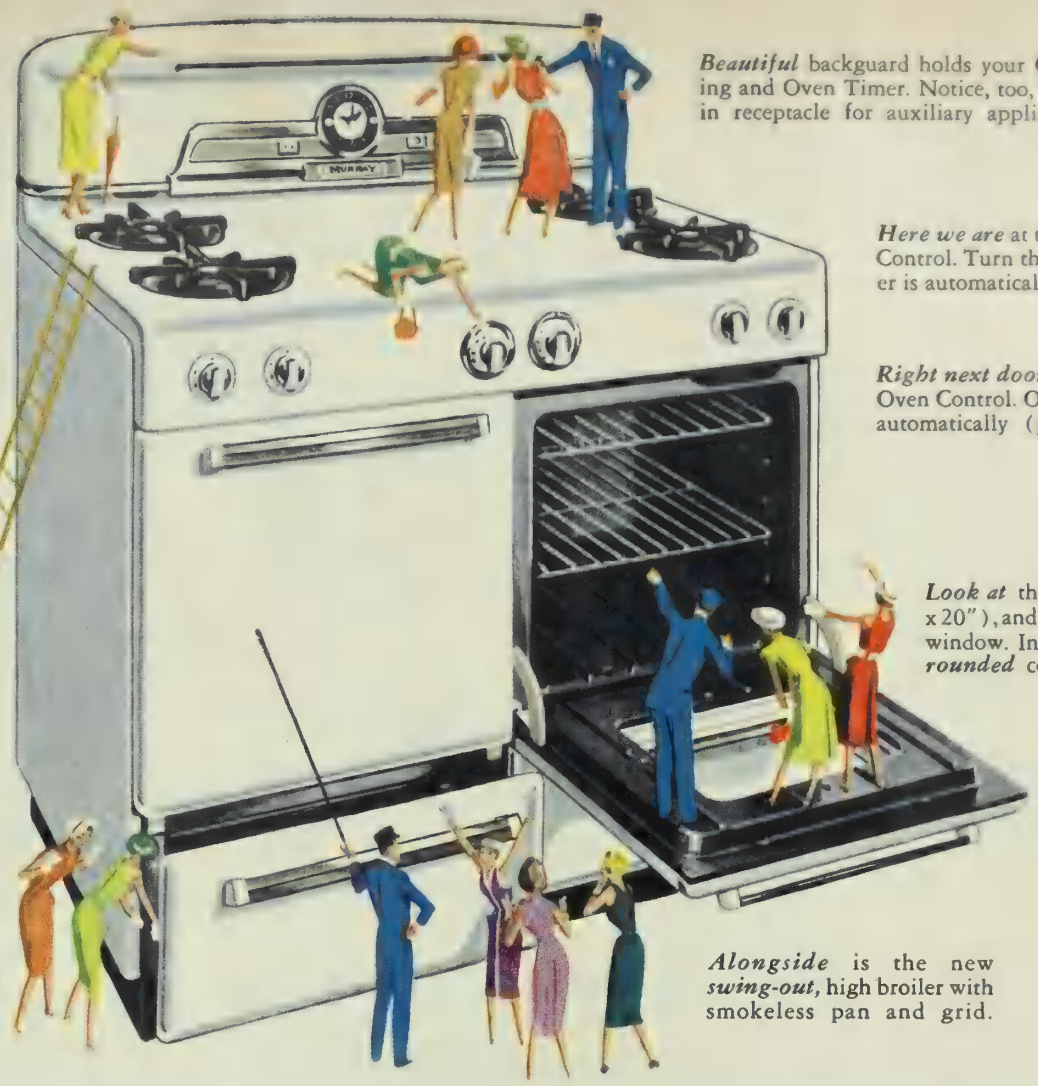
■ Plan an overflow container. For the Hills this is the old trunk Jane's mother brought to this country. She calls it "the department of utter desperation."

● When possible, arrange to have the new house spanking clean.

On "M" Day

"We're up early moving day and breakfast off paper plates. Last packed," said Jane, "is a hodgepodge case—things needed first: light bulbs, toilet tissue, etc.'

● Delegate a reception committee to greet the movers and help place basic pieces—perhaps have coffee ready!



Check List. (Lest you forget.)

■ Utilities. Have gas, electricity, water and telephone disconnected at the old address, connected at the new.

■ Deliveries. Terminate deliveries of milk, bread and papers.

■ Radio and television. Ask skilled service men to disconnect and re-erect aerials.

■ Fuel. Have a starter supply in the new house.

Small scale model helped Jane Hill visualize new kitchen. As planned, they can take it on the next move—all but sink and floor covering.

Peninsula arrangement of range creates compact work unit within large kitchen, and counter provides a place for children's snacks.

Equipment arranged for easy meal-getting leaves room for children's activities out from underfoot. Plan evades changing very low windows.

and this is what we did about it on a $250 budget

"YOU can see what I mean," said Jane Hill, giving a vigorous sweep with her arm. "Sixty-five dollars a month, but it was the best we could do, and with the baby coming ——" She laughed. "Besides, we've moved five times in five years, and we just make do the best we can."

We stood in that kitchen, and none of us was able to speak for five minutes. I myself didn't find any adjectives to describe the unutterably dreadful room. You knew it was a kitchen because of one tiny sink basin with two rusty faucets dripping in it. And there was a wall closet with shelves—the only equipment in the room.

The plaster was cracked, paint peeling from the walls, the floors squeaked when you took a step, and you could see the cellar if you bent over, dim beneath the floor boards. Five doors (one leading to an unused stairway (Continued on Page 221)

Raymond's cook tonight. Jane took the baby to the doctor.

By LOUELLA G. SHOUER

"DEAR JOURNAL: I'm about to try and barbecue a small whole pig. Never having seen it done before, I'm going strictly by guesswork and imagination. I need the know-how in a jiffy, as I'm having the party next Saturday," wrote Jane Hill.

Though we don't barbecue pigs very often ourselves, we air-mail-specialed the how-to-do in time for the party. The piglet was barbecued successfully and the party was a gala affair.

This wasn't the first time Jane depended on the JOURNAL for recipe help. "The colonel was coming to dinner," Jane said. "It was a big event for us. The meal had to be special. My new JOURNAL came that day, with an elegant picture of a meal featuring crown roast of pork—just the meal to make an impression. It was kind of expensive, but I got a big charge out of the colonel's compliments. Thanks to the JOURNAL, everything turned out slick."

Just in case. You may never need or want to barbecue a pig, but you might like the barbecue sauce that saved the day for Jane. She uses it often for spareribs and Beef 'n' Buns.

BARBECUE SAUCE

Chop 3 large onions, enough to make 1 cup. Mix with 1¼ cups condensed consommé, or use stock made with meat paste and hot water. Add 1 cup chili sauce, ½ cup catchup, 1 cup vinegar, ¼ cup Worcestershire sauce, ⅛ teaspoon Tabasco, 2 tablespoons brown sugar, ¼ cup butter or margarine, 1½ teaspoons salt. Simmer for ¾ hour, till mixture has reduced some and flavor is well blended. Cool and store in a jar in refrigerator. Makes about a quart. Use as needed.

BARBECUED SPARERIBS

Allow 1 side of spareribs for every 2 persons. There isn't too much meat on spareribs anyway, and you want to have enough.

Season ribs with salt and pepper. Put them in a large roasting pan and roast, uncovered, in moderately slow oven, 325° F., for 1 hour, turning occasionally so all the ribs brown lightly. Now pour barbecue sauce over each layer of ribs. Continue baking until ribs are very tender—at least another hour. Time depends on how many layers you have in the pan.

For outdoor broiling, precook as above without sauce—marinate in the sauce and lay on broiler rack over a good bed of coals. Broil, turning frequently.

New note: The spareribs are even better, we've found, if you brush each set of ribs lightly with Chinese soy sauce, then with honey, before you start. This bakes in—helps them brown and makes them thoroughly delectable in flavor. Try it sometime, Jane.

Cue for a crowd. Whenever Raymond's sister, Sandra, comes to visit, Jane never knows when a Westminster teen-age crowd may arrive. One day last summer, Sandra came home from the tennis court with several pals in tow—all ravenously hungry. Jane had a jar of barbecue sauce for spareribs, and some hamburger she was going to use for meat loaf, in the refrigerator. There wasn't enough hamburger to make regular hamburgers for that many guests plus Terry, Debby and Candy, and it was too hot to stand there and fry them if there was enough, so she made beef creole—a JOURNAL budget recipe that appeared some years ago which stretched the hamburger and was more of a hit than the old favorite. It is now known in the Hill family as Beef 'n' Buns. It goes to picnics, battery parties, and is the favorite order for lunch of the young trio at home. Teen-agers can make it themselves—the budget can take it.

BEEF 'N' BUNS

Brown 1 pound hamburger in 1 tablespoon shortening, stirring so it will own nicely. Add 2½–3 cups barbe- sauce (above) and 1 green pepper, ed—and if you like the flavor, ½ spoon celery seed. (The Hills do!) mmer 10 minutes. Split buns. Toast you like. Ladle the quickly made rbecued beef into the buns. This kes enough for 8 buns, depending how heavy-handed you are in fill- them.

"Living in a poultry- sing area, we can buy cracked eggs r thirty-five cents a dozen, so we ve lots of lemon pies, and it's ky I learned to make a good one. aven knows what might have hap- ned if I hadn't. I use extra egg ites when I have them for what we ll a high-handed meringue on top." Here's the lemon pie Jane and ner readers say is tops:

inner on daddy. You won't find aymond caught short in an emer- gency. Jane keeps the cupboard well stocked and he can put together a meal that is dandy eating whenever the situation demands. If Jane is called away unexpectedly to take one of the children to the doctor, for instance, he hauls out the JOURNAL recipe for Tunaroni—an off-the-shelf casserole the children love. The recipe serves 8, but the 5 Hills can really do away with it.

TUNARONI

Cook an 8-ounce package elbow macaroni in boiling salted water until tender. Drain. Rinse with boiling water and drain again. Make a cream sauce of 2 tablespoons butter or margarine, 2 tablespoons flour and 2 cups milk—half cream when you're making it for company. Season with 1 tablespoon chopped onion, ½ tablespoon curry powder—or prepared mustard, if you don't like curry—and ¾ teaspoon salt. Combine sauce with macaroni. Add 1 cup grated cheese and 2 cans tuna, drained and flaked into pieces. Mix everything together. Pour into a casserole and bake in moderate oven, 350° F., until bubbly and brown on top—about 30 minutes.

A lucky strike in a potluck supper! "The Guard is always having some shindig. We frequently have potluck suppers in the wintertime," Jane told us. "Everybody gets tired of the same old things—Boston baked beans, macaroni and cheese, and such. This past fall they nominated me to bring the casserole. I racked my brains for a week trying to think of something filling, hearty and terribly good that would keep hot and not get all funny by the time I got it there, but I came up with exactly nothing. One day I was leafing through an old JOURNAL—one of the few the kids hadn't completely cut up—and saw a wonderfully good-looking dish—Cassoulet. It had beans in it, yes, but meat and stuff too. It sounded delectable. Usually I try a recipe out on the family before I take it to a party. This time I didn't. It was terrific. Everybody loved it. I've made it dozens of times since."

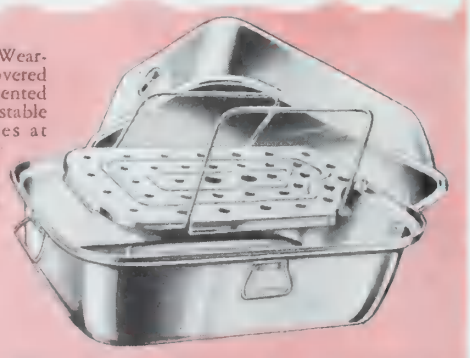
You'll have the best turkey you ever tasted with a Wear-Ever aluminum roaster! The aluminum spreads heat fast and evenly so that your turkey—and all your roasts—are beautifully browned, tender and juicy.

Choose the type that suits you—the streamlined, open roaster, or the ever-popular covered roaster. The flat-bottomed pans do double duty for your every-day baking. Patented aluminum lifting racks and easy-to-clean corners make either roaster a joy to use.

CHEF BERARD, authority and consultant on cooking methods and fine cuisine, says:

"Oven heat and roasting time are so important that I've made up a handy chart for you to use in your kitchen. Wear-Ever will send it to you free.



"In addition, I'd like you to try two of my turkey dressing recipes. Both the chart and recipes are yours for the asking. Write The Aluminum Cooking Utensil Co., Dept. 1811, New Kensington, Pa."

Soak a 12-ounce package navy beans overnight in 1 quart water. The next morning add 2½ quarts water, ¼ pound diced salt pork, ¼ teaspoon salt, 1 onion, chopped, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, a pinch of thyme and half a bay leaf, crumbled. Cook about 20 minutes and add ¼ pound salami or Italian sausage, skinned and cut into small pieces. Cook slowly until beans are tender.

Bone and cut 1½ pounds shoulder of lamb and 1 pound pork shoulder into chunks. Season with salt and pepper. Brown the meat in a heavy stewpan or roaster with 5 onions, chopped, using only enough fat to prevent sticking. Pour off the fat after browning. Add the bones for flavor, 1 clove garlic, finely minced, and 1 cup tomato sauce. Cover and bake about 1½ hours in a moderately slow oven, 325° F.

Now to prepare the casserole: Remove bones. Drain liquid from the beans and save. Arrange beans and meat in alternate layers in the casserole. Pour over this the gravy from the pork and lamb mixed with the liquid from the beans. Repeat until all is used.

Put back in oven for another hour. Serve in the casserole in which it was baked. And serve it as hot as you can.

She hadn't planned it. If there's anything in the kitchen Raymond likes to do better than making jelly, pickles and chutney—he makes a red tomato-apple chutney that's a humdinger—it's making the JOURNAL's French bread. Either he or Jane makes French bread at least twice a month for themselves, plus the extra times they make it for Guard affairs. They have even made it for their new landlord.

This specialty has saved the day many a time. For instance, there was the night Raymond asked two couples to come home with them after a Guard dance without telling Jane. Stuck for something to serve them as a snack with hot coffee, she suddenly thought of the JOURNAL's Yardstick Sandwich, and she had a loaf of the French bread left. Everyone thought she was a whiz to come up with a combination like that just offhand.

You don't need to bake your own bread to do the Yardstick Sandwich, but you do need a loaf of crusty French or Italian bread.

YARDSTICK SANDWICH

Slice a loaf of French bread down, but not through the bottom, in thick slices. Separate and spread with butter or margarine mixed with a little prepared mustard—about 1 tablespoon to 4 tablespoons butter—and ½ clove grated or crushed garlic. Slip thin slices of sweet onion and cheese in each slit. Set loaf on a baking sheet. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., 15 minutes. The bread heats, the cheese melts, the onion stays the way it should, the crust gets potato-chip crisp.

Everybody pulls off a hunk. Good with coffee and dill pickles.

Pie without a pie plate. Raymond is an apple fancier—more particularly an apple-pie fancier. The children had used Jane's only piepan—a glass one—for milk for the cat, and it got broken in their play. Jane hadn't got around to replacing it. Meanwhile, Raymond went pieless—but not without comment.

After dinner one evening, with the children in bed, Jane was curled up with the JOURNAL. A five-layer apple tart on one of the food pages took her eye. "Daddy," she said, "look at this perfectly scrumptious apple thing. The pastry is cut in circles and stacked. We've got some apples. Le make it."

And make it they did—that evening. "V had such fun," Jane said. "Ours looked good as the picture and oh, was it good! V didn't know many people in those days a cooking sprees were often our favorite e ning entertainment. Now we use the ap tart to impress our guests and relatives so terribly vulnerable about love. It was the soft, tender things that got hurt in any but the gentlest hands.

She turned away, her face troubled. She intended to give Nick Reardon a very wide berth, of course. But she couldn't help wishing that he lived somewhere else.

The following week, Miss Baines called and said she was having a few "young people" over on Friday. When the night arrived, Marcy put on her prettiest dress and left with high hopes for Miss Baines' narrow, elegant house in the East Sixties. However, when she arrived and was presented to the other guests, her spirits took a downward curve. Miss Baines' idea of "young people" seemed to be a group of married couples in their early forties, all looking very cultivated and bookish. As Marcy accepted a minute glass of sherry, she thought gloomily, This doesn't exactly look like a bacchanalian orgy—I doubt if we'll all wind up on the floor later with grapes in back of our ears.

Miss Baines, however, drew her straight to a corner where a young man of about thirty-five rose expectantly. He gave a rather weedy effect and had a pleasantly craggy face, but it was his smile that reached out to Marcy—it was so sweet, so gentle.

"Marcia," Miss Baines was saying, "this is Mr. Hugh Edwards. . . . Miss Pringle." And she immediately melted away like a delivery messenger relieved of a package.

"Hello," Marcy said in her bright, friendly way. She sat down next to him on the sofa. "Where do you know Miss Baines from?"

"I deal in real estate too," he said. "Our paths cross pretty often. She's a remarkably astute businesswoman." He smiled again. "She promised me a pretty girl tonight, and I must say she came through."

Marcy looked at him searchingly and then felt something ease inside her. You could believe what he said. It was funny how you could tell just by looking at a man. If a girl fell in love with a man like this, he would make a wonderful husband, loyal, steady, dependable. Thoughtful, too, of your happiness. Of course you had to fall in love with him first, but that oughtn't to be too hard.

They talked for a long time and it was very pleasant. Refreshments were served. Hugh made a date with her for the following Friday night and Marcy was taken home by him, well pleased. She went to sleep and began to dream almost at once about Nick Reardon.

The following Monday morning, all radios blared out warnings of a hurricane sweeping up from the South. As the day progressed, the sky became ominously dark; offices and stores began closing hurriedly; the subways and busses were soon jammed with people scurrying home. Marcy made it just in time, with the wind whining shrewishly and whipping at her skirts and the few thin city trees already bending pitifully with the strong gusts. After she got upstairs, the full fury of the storm broke: everything seemed to be crashing around her; rivers of dark rain smashed at the windowpanes. She was terrified.

And then the telephone rang. "Miss Pringle?" a man's voice said. "This is Nick Reardon from upstairs. Are you alone? Are you frightened?"

"S-scared to death," Marcy stammered. "It's awful—it sounds as if the world is coming to an end."

His voice grew stronger with decision. "You shouldn't be alone. I'm coming down."

"Oh, no!" she said, but there was a click. She hung up, swallowing hard. Between the hurricane and Nick Reardon, she was more afraid of Nick Reardon.

There was a knock at her door a few moments later. As she looked at him framed by the doorway, she thought with some wistfulness, He certainly is a broth of a boy. She had a better background picture of him by this time, thanks to Miss Baines, who often saw Nick's aunt. From what she could gather, Nick saw a great many girls who telephoned him all the time and sent him notes; he liked to take sudden trips to far places and he was cool to the thought of marriage. All in all, to Marcy, he was the worst possible emotional risk. But she couldn't help admiring him. It was like gazing at a sable coat in a window before you walked on to look at something you could afford to buy.

"Come in," she said. "You were awfully nice to come down."

He grinned. "Think nothing of it. Part of the Good Neighbor Policy." He walked in, looking around him appreciatively. "You have a nice place."

There was a terrible crashing sound outside and Marcy jumped and then smiled wanly. "I'm not sure what period it is," she said. "Early Miscellaneous, I guess. Sit down, won't you?"

They both sat down, Marcy nervously, Nick completely at ease. "One thing we won't talk about," he said, "is the weather. How was your week end?"

Marcy realized that she was tense in every muscle, as if braced against something. She made a mammoth effort to relax. "Oh, fine," she said lightly. "The usual thing—a few brawls, a little gambling at the track, two hashish parties."

He laughed. "It sounds restful." And then he rose and came over to the sofa where she was sitting. Marcy stiffened again as he sat beside her. "Tell me about yourself," he said.

She began to talk almost hurriedly, as if in this way she could erect a high guard between them. He broke into the conversation from time to time. The room darkened and then lightened again; the storm gradually grew quieter. He asked her about her childhood; she found herself asking about his. They uncovered rich seams of reminiscence that made them laugh a little, although it was gentle laughter. Most small towns, it seemed—whether in New England or the Middle West—were very much alike.

From small towns, they went to books, music. He seemed surprised that she liked good music; she was equally astonished that he did too. And when she told him how much she loved to ski, his whole face became alive.

"Do you?" he said. "In the winter, I go skiing almost every week end."

As the minutes passed, a queer thing happened to Marcy; it was as if something were drawing them closer all the time. She knew he felt it too. Even the silences enclosed them in a kind of intimacy; she would look up in the middle of a sentence and find his eyes, very dark and gentle, holding hers in a gaze that was almost like a kiss.

Finally they both saw that a pale, watery sun was filtering through the windows. It was almost six o'clock. Nick glanced down at his watch and cried, "Good grief! I'm late now for an appointment."

As she rose, an old memory stabbed through Marcy; she stood motionless, impaled upon it. She could see herself, at seventeen, waiting for three hours in a chill wind on a residential street corner—Rocky's street—hoping, praying for him to appear because she hadn't heard from him for so long. And then he had come down the block, tall, very handsome, frowning a little. She had started walking toward him as if the meeting were completely accidental, but he had stopped only a few moments, after all, laughing and chatting about nothing, as if they had never meant anything to each other at all. And finally he had said, "I've got to go, Marcy; I'm late now for an appointment." She had thought in sudden agony, With whom? What girl is he seeing now?

She and Nick were at the door; he was gazing down at her. She cleared her throat. "Thanks again," she said, "for coming down."

"Any time." He grinned. "I'm always available for hurricanes." And then his face stilled. "I wonder . . . could I see you some evening?"

Marcy swallowed. "I—I don't know," she said. And an inward voice cautioned, Don't, don't, don't. Don't start with him and you won't get hurt.

He seemed surprised. "Don't know? Why don't you know?"

"Well"—she drew in her breath—"I've been so busy. I'm not really settled yet."

He smiled. "Of course," he said. "I understand. I'll try you again a little later."

She went out with Hugh Edwards a few times and they were pleasant, peaceful evenings. Every time she looked at Hugh it seemed to her that he represented safety and security, but somehow she didn't feel very attracted to him. She began to wonder despairingly why she always seemed drawn most strongly to the very things that were worst for her—like Nick. She couldn't get him out of her mind.

She saw Miss Baines quite often. It was restful to be with her and it was such a beautiful house, filled with old things as perfectly preserved as its owner. Marcy couldn't get over the feeling of tranquillity in the rooms; every time she entered the rose-and-gray drawing room it was like entering a cathedral.

"I think," she said impulsively to Miss Baines one evening, "that your house is like you, Miss Baines: small and elegant and—and at peace with the world."

Miss Baines smiled. "It's all a matter of spirit," she said. "A matter of weighing one thing against another in life and choosing carefully that which is most worth while, that which will give the most joy, the least pain. It is so simple, Marcia, and yet"—she shook her smartly coiffed blue-gray head and went on—"how few abide by such a rule!"

Sometimes, in the elevator of her own house, or in the vestibule or on the street, Marcy would meet Nick Reardon. They always talked for a minute or two; always the memory of the closeness they had shared during the hurricane would come back to her, making her heart twist a little. She almost wished he had not been so nice then; it would make it easier now for her to turn away, as she always did, making some excuse. For, of course, his being warm and companionable with her for those few hours wasn't anything special; he was probably like that with every girl—it came to him as naturally as breathing.

One evening she was sitting in the little garden in the back when he came out and joined her. It was strange, to Marcy, how everything changed in that one moment of his coming—from a state of rather sluggish peace to a high, quivering note of expectancy.

"Hi," he said. He sat down opposite her in the darkness, took out his pipe and began packing it with tobacco. "I haven't seen much of you lately. How is everything?"

"Fine." She cleared her throat. "How about you?"

"O.K., I guess."

He lit a match and sucked the flame into his pipe; she could see his lowered eyes, the beautiful modeling of his mouth, the strong, taut line of his jaw and chin. She looked away.

From upstairs came the high sound of a child's voice. Nick shifted in his seat.

"That's Jeremy," he said. He smiled. "I guess he won't go to sleep."

Marcy looked at him again. "Do you like children?"

"Sure. Always did. Of course they're a terrible responsibility when they're your own. There's nothing like a few kids to tie down a man."

"Or a wife," Marcy said, looking down carefully to her lap. "A house." She looked up, smiling. "The whole thing is a dark conspiracy being plotted against you all the time. Someone like you must be pretty wary."

He grinned and leaned back. "I'm not much of a bargain for a girl," he said. "And I must admit I love my freedom." He took his pipe from his mouth, and his face changed. "Of course, one of these days my whole way of living will pall. I'll want to settle down. I know that."

Marcy thought, I wouldn't want to hold my breath that long. She cleared her throat and made her voice light. "Maybe you'll be sold down the river before that. Some girl might pour a love potion in your coffee."

He grinned and then leaned forward, his face still. "You're a funny girl," he said. "You can seem so flip and assured of yourself, like now—and then again you can look scared to death sometimes. What are you scared of, Marcy?"

MARCY'S throat locked. Suppose she said, "I'm scared of you"? Suppose she told him that when it came to love she wasn't flip and assured at all—that, instead, she was terribly vulnerable? But she didn't say anything.

"Marcy," he said softly, "you're so lovely."

She felt a pressure in her chest as she met his eyes. This was how it always started—with the whispered words, the wild lifting of the heart, the soft thrills. But it was the end that counted. You had to think about the end.

"I like so much to be with you," he was saying. "You're so different from the other girls I know, Marcy. You have so much more to offer." He leaned forward. "When are we going to have that date?"

The words seemed to tremble on the warm, still air. For a moment Marcy closed her eyes. It was as if she were standing on the edge of an abyss. Should she jump, after all? Maybe she would land on a cloud; maybe she would break her neck. There was small chance of the first's happening, every chance for the second's.

She opened her eyes. "I'm sorry," she said. "I can't make a date right now. I—I'm doing some extra work for my office."

After that he was polite when they met, but that was all. Marcy knew a queer sense of loss. Sometimes she looked at herself in the mirror and thought, Pringle, you're a smart girl—you know only too well what you saved yourself. But it was cold comfort, somehow.

She joined an art class; she went to lectures; she enrolled for a course in Music Appreciation. She met people and, remembering Miss Baines' advice, measured them carefully in her mind. There were one or two who looked promising, but she couldn't be sure. In the meantime, she took no immediate joy in life.

One evening she went over to Miss Baines' house for dinner. Marcy had been thinking about Nick all day; somehow she couldn't get him out of her mind. After dinner, in the rose-and-gray drawing room, she leaned forward impulsively.

"Miss Baines," she said, "were you ever in love?"

Miss Baines smiled. "There was someone," she said. "When I was a girl. Henry Cotterell. Your grandfather would remember him, Marcia."

The residue of life is short. Live as on a mountain. It matters not whether here or there: everywhere you are a citizen of the city of the world. Let me see and witness a true man, a life conformed to nature. If they cannot bear him, let them make away with him. Better that, than life on their terms. No more talk of what the good man should be. Be it! Embrace in your regard all time and all being—and see that by the side of being, all individuals are but a grain of millet: by that of time, as the turn of a screw.

Marcy's face was eager. "What happened?"

"Why, nothing," Miss Baines said. "Nothing at all. Henry came from poor, undistinguished people; he was determined to be a teacher. My father couldn't abide him. Said he'd cut me off without a penny if I married him."

Marcy frowned slightly. "What was he like? Henry, I mean."

"He was a fine young man. Very attractive too. He loved me." Miss Baines smiled. "I guess you could say I almost loved him—it would have been easy enough. But I abided by papa's decision." She shook her head. "I knew that it was a sensible one. Henry wanted a big family and he made so little money—it would have been a terrible struggle, I suppose."

Marcy stared. "I see," she said.

"I never regretted the decision," Miss Baines said. "Henry married someone else and had four children." She shook her head. "I saw his wife when she was only fifty. My dear, she looked almost as old as I do now." Her pale blue eyes met her reflection in the mirror and she smiled with faint modesty. "Most people think I carry my years remarkably well, but the secret is simply a calm, well-ordered life."

Marcy felt a choking sensation in her chest. Her eyes went around the room, resting on the old, beautifully cared-for furniture and then returning to the old, beautifully cared-for figure sitting opposite her. Miss Baines was truly well preserved. So was her heart. It was no wonder. It had never really been used.

Marcy thought suddenly, How safe can you play it? And, sitting there, looking into Miss Baines' calm, empty eyes, feeling the calm, empty tranquillity of the rooms around her, she knew the answer: Too safe.

She jumped up suddenly. "Forgive me," she said. "But I've just remembered something I ought to attend to." And later, on the street, she felt breathless, as if she had been released from some tight, narrow space and did not know what to do with her newfound freedom.

She went home. In her apartment, she wandered from room to room, and then she saw a small stuffed animal that she had bought a long time ago for Jeremy, the little boy upstairs. She picked it up, left the flat and went up two flights of stairs in the hall. When she knocked at the door, Jeremy's mother answered.

"WHY, hello!" she said with pleased surprise. "Come in, won't you?"

"I thought Jeremy might like this," Marcy said.

And then she saw the little boy inside, fat-cheeked, dark-eyed, smiling at her. Her heart contracted. He was such a darling; his mother and father were so nice. Why had she held back from them—and from dear old Mr. Hines on the top floor? Why had she been measuring everyone so carefully?

The little visit was filled with warmth, with laughter. Afterward, Marcy went downstairs and into the garden. She wondered, as she moved around in the warm darkness, why she still had this breathless feeling of release. She felt almost giddy with it.

She looked up to the third floor with only a faint hope. But Nick's light was on, and one window was open. She stood motionless, hardly breathing, and then she picked up a pebble and weighed it in her hand. She thought, You're walking right into this—whatever you get, you've asked for it. And then she thought of Miss Baines. She laughed softly and threw the pebble with all her strength. It didn't go through the window, but it glanced off the pane on top. A moment later, Nick's head appeared; she could see him peering down, frowning.

"Hi!" she called up. Her face was tilted toward him; her eyes were shining. "It's Marcy. What are you doing?"

For a moment, he didn't answer. Then she could see his teeth flash in a smile. "Be down in a minute," he said.

It was no more than that before he was beside her in the darkness.

"Don't try a rock next time," he said. "Your right arm is too good."

"Left," she said. "I'm a southpaw. What are you doing home tonight anyway?" she asked.

"Reading." He hesitated and then shook his head. "I had a date and broke it," he told her. "Somehow I wasn't in the mood." With his hands bunched inside his pockets he walked away a few steps. "Sometimes you get tired of everyone you know." He turned. For a moment he didn't speak; he just looked at her steadily. And then he said, "Maybe it's because a funny thing has happened to me. There's a girl I can't get out of my mind."

Her breath came, light and quick, in her throat. "Is there?" she whispered.

He took a step toward her. "I don't know her very well," he said. "She won't let me, for some reason." He moved slowly until he stood in front of her. "I wish she would. I have a feeling that ——" But he didn't go on; he just stood there, very close, looking down into her eyes. And then he whispered, "Marcy?"

She closed her eyes. Maybe my heart will break, she thought; maybe they'll have to take five stitches in it afterward—but at least I'll be using it.

And then she felt his arms around her, his mouth on hers. Something warm, exciting, wonderful shot through her; it was as if she were flying downward into space. She had jumped, then. Was she going to land on a cloud or was she going to break her neck? She didn't know; she didn't care—she was too busy living. But the way it felt right now, she was landing on the cloud.

THE AUCTION SALE

the high spring seat, proud of my mother. She always wore a becoming dress and a hat.

While father stowed the groceries in the back I hopped up over the front wheel, and there in the wagon seat, weighted down by a big sandstone, lay the advertisements of the sale. They were red and blue and orange, and a brisk wind fluttered the corners so they played a little tune. I liked the bright colors and the staccato sound. On the prairie, things were mostly dun-colored and mighty still. I sat down in the umbrella's circle of cool shade and spelled out the words in big black letters at the bottom of the sale bills: Bill Hensley, Owner.

Father and mother looked at the sale bills and then at each other, and for a minute nobody said a word. There was no sound anywhere except the sad song of the wind and the loud beating of my heart. Then father picked up the reins and backed away from the hitching post.

"I'm not surprised. I knew they'd never patch it up," he said. He sounded just like he did when he'd won an argument.

Mother looked sad. She said, "It makes me sick. They were the best neighbors we ever had."

The Hensleys lived only seven miles from our homestead, and we swapped seed corn and recipes and fresh sausage and headcheese at butchering time.

Father sounded grim when he said, "Bill's all right."

Mother came right back: "Nell Hensley's a fine woman. She's sensitive and timid. She did a foolish thing, and now Bill and the rest of you men sit in judgment on her. If there hadn't been so much talk they would have worked it out."

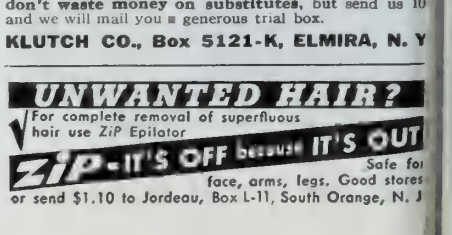
"Talk!" The word fairly exploded in father's mouth. "And who's done the big share of the talking, I'd like to know? You women have kept the pot boiling long after the men dropped the subject."

"Well, most of them were just expressing their husbands' opinions," mother told him, her black eyes snapping, and he didn't even try to answer that one.

He flicked the whip over the mare's fat rump and we sailed out of town and took the angle that led northwestward across the prairie. A bright wind ran ahead of us and I scrooched down comfortably, sniffing the grocery box in back: raisins, ginger cookies, cheese and Bologna sausage. It made my mouth water.

MOTHER was right. There had been a lot of talk that spring and summer, and the men had talked as much as the women. I knew because I was at that in-between age when I found myself welcomed by groups of either sex—or, more likely, they just didn't notice me. Anyway, I had heard the Hensley story a lot of times. It always sounded different, but in my own mind I had a hazy but very exciting picture of what had happened.

Bill Hensley was a careless farmer, not hard-working and prosperous like father. But he made a good bit of money by trading. He was always buying and selling cattle and horses and farm machinery. He spent a lot of time away from home, and Nellie was often lonesome. She was scared, too, especially of storms. Early that spring, while Bill was away from home, a bad one hit.



Nellie saw it kicking up dust over in the northwest; the slim, black funnel writhing and twisting across the floor of the prairie, and the yellow clouds boiling upward across the sky. She started to run, whimpering and scared half crazy, and the storm coming closer every minute.

It caught her just as she got to Jed Rayder's place. None of us knew Jed very well—because he was a bachelor, I guess. A great gust of wind struck Nellie, flinging her into Jed's barbed-wire fence and tearing most of her clothes off. Jed dashed out and carried her into the house just as the twister hit full-force. It tore Jed's barn and cowshed to splinters, lifted and passed over the house, plowing through the wheat field just beyond.

Bill Hensley had taken a licking in a horse trade in town that day and had made for home and Nellie. The main part of the storm had just sideswiped his buildings, but when he arrived about dusk he found things in a sorry state: one corner of the porch gone, and the henhouse; there were chicken feathers all over the place, but no chickens and no Nellie. He started out to look for her, and seeing that it was getting dark sooner than he had counted on, he stopped at Jed Rayder's to borrow a lantern.

The story was always like that up to that point. From there on it seemed like everyone had a different opinion. They ranged from Bill finding Nellie unconscious on Jed's bed while Jed dressed her wounds, to lying in his arms while he made love to her.

Father and mother never said much either way, but I knew that mother sided with Nellie, and father always got that grim look when Jed's name was mentioned. Maybe it was because Jed was handsome and had such fine manners with women. Even mother got shiny-eyed and flushed when he talked to her in his Southern drawl.

I was sorry about Nellie. She was little and soft and laughed a lot. She played gay tunes on the piano. They made my toes tingle and my fingers ache for a keyboard. Yes, I was sorry about Nellie, but I was glad about the auction. An auction sale was the finest entertainment the prairie folks had. The whole neighborhood would turn out, some of them driving fifteen or twenty miles if the sale was a big one.

I looked at the date on a sale bill and counted the days on my fingers. Ten. Ten long, hot, windy days with nothing to do but wait. I wished time worked like a telescope so you could push it together, shorten it on lonesome days, stretch it on pleasant ones.

Mother was looking at one sale bill. She said, "He's selling Nell's piano, John. Let's buy it."

FATHER scowled at the bill he read as he drove. He said, "I'll buy this span of young mules if they sell right."

Mother went on as if he hadn't said anything about mules. "Jason is just the right age for piano lessons, and it will be wonderful for me on winter days." Delight shivered up and down my spine. In ten days we would have a piano. Mother's tone left no doubts.

Father said sternly, "If Jason has any time outside of his chores he'd best be learning to turn a straight furrow. I won't have a sissy for a son."

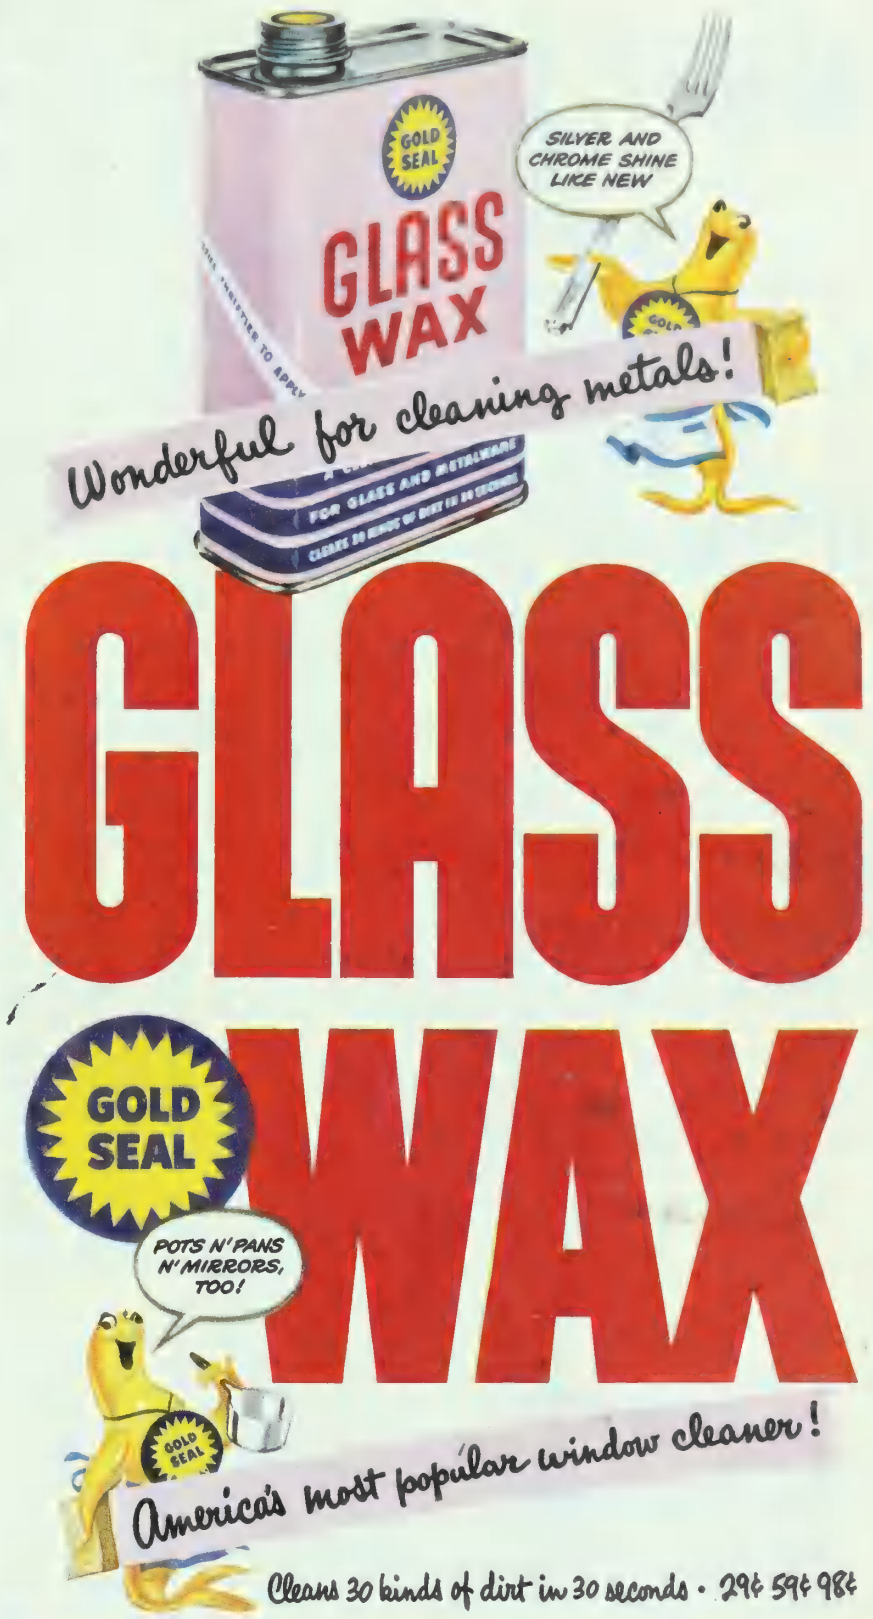
I could feel mother's heart beating fast against my arm. "And I won't have a clodhopper for mine. Jason can have nice manners, some culture even if we do live miles from town," she said.

"Nice manners don't call for music lessons," father told her, his jaw clamped hard. "If we buy anything at all at Bill Hensley's sale, we'll buy those mules."

"I have my two hundred dollars from Aunt Dora's estate. I'll buy the piano with that."

FATHER snorted. "You've spent that two hundred dollars twice over, Emily. The extra bedroom, the curtains and the new carpet ——"

"They're all paid for and I'm sure you enjoy them as much as I do," mother pointed out. "We'll call the piano Aunt Dora's gift. She would like that."



Father seldom lost his temper with mother or argued with her about buying anything. We were the only family in the country that had a real front room without a bed in it. We had two bedrooms, curtains at all the windows, and Brussels carpets on the floor, and we got the Ladies' Home Journal by subscription every month. But father balked at a piano.

"Your Aunt Dora was a thrifty woman. She wouldn't like for you to buy luxuries you can't afford. We can't afford a piano this year, Emily. I don't want to hear any more about it." There was no coaxing father when he spoke like that.

The heat waves danced in front of us. It was hot and uncomfortable between them when they were quarreling. I squirmed and laid my head in mother's lap and went to sleep. I dreamed of walking down a big room toward a piano that stood near a window. I wanted to run to get to it, to play it; but my feet had weights on them. My legs ached, but at last I was there. I adjusted the stool and sat down to play. Instead of music spread on the rack there were dozens of bright-colored sale bills. The name at the bottom stood out in big black letters. John Andrews, Owner. I wakened, feeling cramped and miserable, just as father drove into our yard. Then there were things to do and no more time for talk.

There was time at supper, but nobody talked. Father ate silently and mother kept piling food on my plate even though I wasn't eating. Mother didn't eat much either.

She always started Sunday dinner right after supper Saturday night. As we pushed our chairs back from the table she said, "I'm going to have baked hen for dinner tomorrow, John. Let Jason help you catch a nice fat one."

Father and I went out into the purplish dusk just as the hens were settling themselves on the roost. I knew when he picked up Old Spec that mother wouldn't like it. I guess he knew it too. He chopped her head off quick, before I could say a word.

Mother met us at the kitchen door with a pail of scalding water. Her eyes weren't pretty when she saw father with the headless speckled hen in his hands, and her words pelted us like hail. She said, "I always pick a laying hen for cooking. That's the only way you can be sure they're healthy. Speck hasn't been on the nest for months."

Father took the pail of water and doused the hen. "Then let her pay for her keep this way. It's plain waste to kill a good layer."

I helped him pluck the feathers, then we took the hen into the kitchen for mother to finish. Father went into the front room to read. I stayed in the kitchen to watch mother dress the hen. She washed and scraped and cleaned, and the warm smell of blood and entrails filled the room. I hated it, but I stayed. It fascinated me to watch the way mother used her hands. They were strong and smooth, and every motion counted; but all at once they slowed and mother stood still, looking surprised. In her hand lay one large soft-shelled egg and several others partly formed. Dead, Old Spec had proved herself.

Mother put the eggs in a dish and handed it to me. "Go show them to your father," she said with a funny quirk around her mouth. Then she raised her voice so it could be heard in the next room. "But this right leg is bound to be tough." Old Spec had been a cripple ever since she lost three toes in a crack of the coop when she was a little chick.

Father eyed the eggs around the edge of his paper. He smiled at me and winked. We didn't say a word.

The Odoms came Sunday just as mother was lifting the dinner. She really had outdone herself this time. Old Spec was tender, short leg and all. The dressing was crumbly and flavored with sage. Tiny bubbles of fat glistened on top of the gravy. The hard lump at the bottom of my stomach gave way for hunger.

No one had a chance to mention the Hensley sale until we had heard all about the new barn Henry Odom was building. I was starting on a big slab of chocolate cake when he said, "I reckon you'll be high bidder on Bill's mules, John."

He spoke through a mouthful of cake. My own forkful froze halfway to my mouth. I held my breath and waited.

FATHER laid his fork carefully across his plate and looked straight down the table at mother. "Yes, I reckon I will. They'll sure knock the fall plowing out in a hurry." He looked at me and said, "They'd make a fine birthday present, eh, Jason?"

"Yes, sir," I said, and choked on my cake. The peaches looked slimy. I pushed the plate away. I'd probably never like peaches and cake again, I thought.

Henry Odom said, "Better eat up, boy. You'll need a lot of muscle to handle that pair of young mules."

Mabel Odom gave mother an odd look and said, "I thought of you, Emily, when I noticed the piano was for sale. You're the only person in the country that can play it." Mabel Odom was jealous of mother.

Mother's smile was all for me. "Yes, I plan to buy it for Jason," she said quietly. Then she asked, "Would you like to be excused now, son? If you want to go outside and water the chickens I'll save your cake and peaches for your supper."

I stayed outside until father and Henry came out. They went to the barn and I drifted toward the house. I stretched out on the front-room carpet, my stomach heavy with too much food, my heart troubled over the quarrel between father and mother.

The carpet felt prickly under my cheek, the crickets sang and the wind rushed by with a lonesome sound. I could hear mother and Mabel talking above the clatter of dishes in the kitchen.

Mabel said, "My cousin's nephew works in the depot at Prairie Center. He told Mollie that Jed Rayder bought a ticket for St. Louis two weeks ago."

"Yes, he told me once that his sister lived there," mother said smoothly, and right away asked Mabel for her mincemeat recipe. When the dishes were finished they went into mother's room to look at her new quilt.

That was a bad week, each day a little hotter than the one before. Mother didn't like it because father took me to the field every morning.

"It's too hot to make a child shock feed," she said every time we started.

"I'll see that he doesn't get a sunstroke, Emily," father would tell her. "He rests a lot in the shade and he won't have to work this afternoon. Jason's a farmer's son; he must be stronger than the weather."

What he said was true. He didn't overwork me. Mother knew it, too, but she found a new reason each day for needing me at the house. She papered the kitchen that week and needed me to help her spread paste. She washed the curtains and needed me to pump water; but father held firmly to his plan of taking me to the field each morning. Afternoons I stayed at the house with her.

It would have been a good plan if it had been made without bickering. I liked driving the team hitched to the hayrake. I felt grown up and important, sitting high on the seat with the reins knotted around my waist. I liked the smooth feel of the pitchfork handle in my palms and to watch the rhythmic swing of father's arms as he shocked and stacked the feed. I liked to smell the cane hay drying in the sun and feel the cool wind on my skin as I rested in the shade, chewing a juicy stalk.

It was pleasant being with mother in the afternoons. Just watching her work around the house, making it comfortable and nice-looking, gave me a good feeling. As she worked she talked to me of books and music, of plays and splendid houses, and of great men who had made history. She sang songs to me and drew a keyboard with charcoal on a white-pine board. She propped a music book in front of me and I learned notes and fingered the soundless keys as she hummed the melodies. My heart nearly burst with wanting to please her and father too.

IT was a long week. We didn't make our usual Saturday trip to town. No one came to Sunday dinner. The wind moaned, "Wait, wait." The crickets sang, "Wait, wait." The whole prairie seemed to wait for Bill Hensley's sale, and mother and father bounced their anger back and forth like a fiery ball. I felt bruised and tired.

Mother wore a thin summer dress to the sale. It was white with blue flowers scattered over it, and her hat had a wide blue bow. Her sleeve felt cool against my cheek as we drove. I tried to be careful not to muss it.

There was quite a crowd there when we got to Bill's place. All the furniture had been taken out into the yard except the coal range and the piano. People were walking around fingering things, talking low like at a funeral.

Mother stopped beside the chair that Nellie had covered with flowered stuff. For a minute I thought she was going to cry.

Father said, "Would you like to buy the chair, Emily?" His voice was soft, and I couldn't breathe for listening for her answer. I had a feeling that if she let father buy the chair, the mules and the piano wouldn't matter.

But she walked away. "I couldn't stand to look at it, let alone sit in it," she said over her shoulder.

PORTRAIT OF A LADY

By ROGIER VAN DER WEYDEN

AMONG the hundreds of portraits at the National Gallery of Art there is one as beautiful as it is baffling. It is the portrait by Rogier van der Weyden (1399/1400–1464) of a young lady tentatively identified as a great heiress of the fifteenth century, Marie de Valengin, daughter of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy. The painting's attraction is twofold: its excellent preservation and the fascination of the lady who sat for it. As is usual with Flemish pictures of this period, it is painted on a piece of wood overlaid with white gesso. On this prepared panel the figure was first painted in monochrome, and the underpainting then covered with thin glazes of colored oil. With this newly discovered oil technique the artist was able to render the most subtle gradations of light, especially noticeable in passages such as the transparent wimple. With age such Flemish panels have acquired a web of minute cracks, a surface as beautiful in its way as the surface of old porcelain.

Though the precision of Flemish painting was suited to the firm structure and the sharp contours of Marie de Valengin's features, if the sitter is she, the clarity of this style only stresses her somewhat eccentric appearance. She is too thin, her lips too thick, her forehead too high. Her looks are outré, defensible only on the basis of Sir Francis Bacon's axiom, "There is no excellent beauty that hath not some strangeness in the proportion." But ugly as her features may be individually, still they combine to suggest a personality so enigmatic, with so many conflicting tendencies, that one becomes absorbed and ends by finding Rogier van der Weyden's model not only enthralling, but, in some way, strangely beautiful.

The first impression is of her preoccupation. Her stare, so oblivious of the spectator, is like a challenging withdrawal; she looks out from a citadel of secrecy. Then one notices her meager body made to appear still thinner by her silken girdle, and afterward her high, intellectual forehead, its domelike appearance exaggerated by its diaphanous covering. All this is psychologically consistent, every detail indicative of a contemplative, somewhat ascetic nature. But this is only one aspect of her character. There is another side, eagerly sensuous and fiercely passionate. It is shown by the thick underlip and the full mouth. Thus the actions of this Burgundian princess must always have been unpredictable, always determined by an unresolved conflict in her personality. She remains an enigma, with something of the baffling quality of that Gothic lady whom John Skelton paradoxically describes:

This midsummer flower
Gentle as falcon
Or hawk of the tower.

They sold the little stuff first. Dishes and pots and pans, garden rakes, hoes and a few tools. People whispered that things were bringing more than they were worth. We moved on to the chairs and tables, to the beds and a sofa that leaked stuffing. Then the crowd crammed the little house to see the stove sell, and the piano. Hank Williams bought the stove, and then we were in the front room, a tight half circle around the piano and the auctioneer. I pushed my way into the front row just as the auctioneer turned to mother.

"Mrs. Andrews, will you be kind enough to show us how this thing works?" he asked.

Mother had never looked so beautiful as when she stepped out from that crowd of sweating men and pushing women. She took off her hat and laid it on top of the piano and turned around for one look at father. Then she sat down and began to play. She played Over the Waves, and bits of the Blue Danube Waltz and Moonlight Sonata. It was wonderful. Like a concert or a play. She picked up her hat and walked back to where I stood. She pushed a handkerchief into my hands, and I didn't know until then that I had been crying. The handkerchief smelled like flowers.

The bidding began and I watched father. He stood like a stone, his lips clamped shut. The bidders dropped out until there were just two. The auctioneer cried, "One-hundred-fifty, one-hundred-fifty once, one-hundred-fifty twice, one-hundred-fifty three times." He paused and shouted, "Sold! Sold to Mrs. Oscar Long for one hundred and fifty dollars." He took a big blue handkerchief from his pocket, wiped his face and announced lunch.

Lunch was free at prairie auction sales. Everybody stood about in little groups eating thick meat-and-bun sandwiches and drinking scalding coffee from tin cups. Some families had the name of going to the sales just to get a free meal.

Mother brought me a sandwich, but I couldn't swallow past the lump in my throat. I wandered around and found Nellie's dog, Sport, lying in the shade of the plum thicket. I coaxed him to eat a little meat, but he wouldn't get up and play. I found father and asked him if I could take Sport home with me.

He said "Yes" so quickly I jumped. I thought of asking him to buy the saddle pony for me. Somehow I knew that right then I could have anything I asked him for except a piano. I didn't ask for the pony. I went back to Sport.

After lunch the auctioneer led the crowd down to the barn. They sold a couple of hogs, the cows, the paint pony and a team of young geldings. Then excitement swept the crowd. Bill Hensley drove into the corral with a flourish. He drove the team of matched mules hitched to a brand-new wagon. It glistened with red and green paint, and the mules were sleek and strong. It was an outfit any man would want. I looked at father, then away. His face had such a naked look. I made for the back of the barn and retched. When I came back, weak and spent, Oscar Long was driving the wagon and mules toward the house to load the piano. I hated Oscar Long.

The crowd shifted and scattered. The sale was over and it hadn't solved a thing. I couldn't go home, sitting between father and mother, squeezed by their anger. I looked around for a place to hide. The barn was empty and looked cool inside. I ducked in, climbed in the manger and lay down on the dusty hay.

It was almost sundown when Bill Hensley's shout wakened me. The crowd had gone. I sat up confused and wet with sweat.

my skin prickly with heat and dust. I stood pulling at my shirt and saw mother stumble through the doorway.

Father caught up with her and put his arm around her and said gently, "Steady, Emily. He's all right. Everything's all right." He kept one arm around her while he lifted me out of the manger with the other one. "You nearly scared your mother to death, son," he said. He didn't sound angry.

"I'm sorry, sir," I said. "I guess I went to sleep."

"I guess you did." Bill Hensley's laugh was loud and coarse. I hoped Jed Rayder would find Nellie in St. Louis and she would forget Bill.

Father drove fast going home. The brightness faded in the west and twilight rode across the prairie on a cool soft wind. My skin quit prickling and I felt all right—just empty.

Father and mother didn't talk about the sale. They didn't talk at all. Everything wasn't all right as father had said. For a little while, when they thought I was lost, they had forgotten about their quarrel. Now I was found and there it was again. I remembered hearing Cassie Turner say it was too bad Bill and Nellie never had a child. A child was a link that held people together, she said. I didn't feel like a link between father and mother. I felt like a wedge holding them apart.

"I want to ride in back with Sport," I said.

Father stopped the wagon, and I climbed over the seat. I put my arm around Sport, but he wouldn't even wag his tail, just slumped closer to the hay. He wanted Nellie. I wondered what father and mother would do if I should climb over the back of the wagon and walk until I was lost. Would they forget their quarrel while they looked for me?

Three corners of the house rest upon the wife; the fourth upon the husband. —SLOVAKIAN PROVERB

I could feel the loneliness closing in as I inched toward the back of the wagon. I hung over the tail gate, looking at the trail dimming out behind us. I hunted for courage to drop to the ground and couldn't find it. I crawled back to Sport. Just then the moon came up, a great, bright disk, riding up over the rim of the prairie, and father turned into our own yard.

There was an unfamiliar dark blur under the cottonwood tree at our back door. I strained my eyes toward it and my heart began to bounce. Tied to the cottonwood, their long heads drooping in sleep, were the matched mules. They were hitched to the new wagon. Its red and green paint glistened in the moonlight, and in the bed, covered with an old quilt, was Nellie's piano.

Mother gave a funny little gasp. "John, the piano. Why—where ——" She who was so quick with words had none with which to finish her question.

Father said quietly, "I gave Oscar Long twenty-five dollars for his bargain. I thought I'd be here in time to help him unload. I reckon he's left the mules and wagon till morning."

Mother found laughter, clear as a bell, silvery as moonlight. "He left the mules and wagon because I gave him twenty-five dollars for his bargain," she said. Her voice sounded young and very gay.

Father said, "Harrumph," and then he laughed, a great ringing shout. "What a day for Oscar Long!" he said, and leaped to the ground. He went around to mother's side of the wagon and held up his arms. "Get off your high horse and come down here where you belong," he told her.

Mother skimmed over the wagon wheel and dropped into his arms. They stood there for a long time and the moon rode higher and a kind of glory filled our yard.

I grabbed Sport and dragged him from the wagon. He nipped my ankle and growled softly, and we started racing each other around the house.

HOW TO GET BETTER MEN ELECTED

blankety-blank politicians with his feet in the public trough.

According to the democratic tradition, to which we pay constant lip service, the public official is representative of the people. The officeholder in this tradition never, as an officeholder, can act for himself or for his friends, but always and only for the public. In his official acts he is never a private, but always a public person.

We should not think of public officials as servants or employees hired by us to do our bidding. The public official is the public itself personified in the specific act that he performs. He must act as the public itself would act if it were able. If we insist upon regarding our officials as servants, then most surely will we get servile officials, without independence or dignity, ready to do the bidding of every voter who orders or threatens them.

On the other hand, if we exalt the public official in accordance with our true traditions, we endow him with a genuine dignity which he cannot surrender without a dire loss of self-respect. It is human nature, I believe, for people to respond to that which is expected of them. If we have a low opinion of the public official, he is likely to agree and to act accordingly, inasmuch as he has little, if anything, to lose. But if we exalt him, he will not wish to lose the respect of his fellow men. He will become more concerned about his integrity and honesty than about his cleverness in conforming to the letter of the law. His sense of service to the public may in time, if properly recognized, become stronger than the satisfaction of giving special favors to personal friends.

Why is the competence of our public officials of such particular importance to our national welfare at this time? As a result of a series of tremendous international disasters, we and our allies now find ourselves confronted by an aggressive and ruthless dictatorship with a power potential greater than Hitler's. In Russia, a young man of ability and promise aspires to a political career. If there is a first-rate ability and talent to be found in Russia—and I do not doubt there is—it is likely to be found in the Politburo and its subsidiary commissions. The results of the last five years, it seems to me, confirm this conclusion.

Are we Americans conceited enough to imagine that with our second-best men directing our strategy we can successfully meet the challenge of the Russians?

Few of our citizens, busy with the task of earning a living in a competitive industrial economy, can be expected to understand the details of the controversies and policies which are so important in our relations with Russia and the rest of the world. We cannot, nor can we ever be expected to, tell our senator or the President what should be done about Iranian oil, the Dardanelles or the support of Bao

Dai. Few of us have the time seriously to study and to understand thoroughly even the domestic problems of inflation, price control or unemployment.

Although we may not have the background or the time to master these difficult problems with which we are confronted, we do have the capacity and the time to understand and to evaluate the candidates for public office in our respective communities. Surely we are now sufficiently mature and self-assured not to support a candidate simply because of his ability to remember names, birthdays and old favors.

Before the advent of radio and television, a talent for telling funny jokes and anecdotes was often considered a necessary qualification for public office. But today with the turn of a switch we have Bob Hope or Fred Allen to entertain us. In public office we need people who know about such things as the Russians, the Chinese, inflation and taxation, none of them exactly humorous.

Of equal importance to the experience, the common sense and the intellectual capacity of the candidate is his sensitiveness to ethical values. He must be able to appreciate the distinctions, which are sometimes subtle and abstruse, but are nevertheless real, in the realm of moral conduct.

Personal loyalty is a fine quality, so long as it is not blind and does not exclude the higher loyalty to truth and to the community. We ought to support candidates whose primary loyalty is to the democratic tradition of our people rather than to friends and cronies. Devoted and uncritical loyalty to personal friends is an estimable characteristic in private individuals, but in public officials it is often but a cloak for what has been aptly described as "a conspiracy for mutual inefficiency." "Loyalty" is not a quality which in itself is a virtue. It has merit only in connection with other virtues.

The real danger from government by crony is not the tangible effects of favoritism or corruption, but the resulting cynicism and disillusionment about democracy itself. Confronted as we are by a relentless attack upon our institutions by the communists, the all-important thing is that we preserve the morale, the spirit and the hopefulness of the democratic tradition.

Only time will tell us whether or not it is a fortunate coincidence that the most critical period in our history arrives just as the census reveals that women now outnumber the men in our nation. The women, I believe, with their intuitive powers of judging the human character, should do a better job of selecting superior public officials than the men have done. In any case, the women now have the opportunity and the power to bring our democratic system through its greatest test. If they see to it that our representatives represent the best that is in us, as in the days of Jefferson, I am sure we can meet the challenge of the Soviet. THE END

Ask any Woman

By MARCELENE COX

CRYING in a woman is like gambling in a man: if kept up, all may be lost.

One of the advantages of being a father is that you never have to remember the ages of your children.

Give first-graders the privilege of signing their names to checks to draw pennies from a bank and they'll all learn to write at once.

Note on flood control to the bride: Do not let your dresser drawers overflow into his!

Sign in front of a house: "You may get nipped a little, but he won't bite."

Boy, describing a fight: "Aw, it wasn't fist to fist, dad, just face to face."

. . . And it came to pass while the mother was busy hither and thither that the child had grown.

When the bride's relatives meet the groom's relatives for a social time, it may be as satisfactory as joining two packs of cards for one game.

Misprint: "Married with pomp, ceremony and old face."

A woman who concentrates too heavily on housework may find herself in the same plight as the duck in the pond: the water kept freezing and his place grew smaller and smaller until one morning he was frozen tight in the middle.

Daughter explains why she didn't fall in love with an ardent suitor: "Loving him would be as hazardous as placing all your faith in a zipper."

Grandmother had a quotation that carried us through all our problems:

"If you are hurt, one of two things may happen: either you are badly hurt or you are not badly hurt.

"If you are not badly hurt, there is nothing to worry about.

"If you are badly hurt, then one of two things may happen:

"Either you recover or you don't recover.

"If you do recover, then there is nothing to worry about.

"If you don't recover you can't worry."

Old advice to husband seekers: "Be patient, but do not look patient."

A girl should be allowed to develop along her own lines—especially if they're good.

An adult as a parent isn't any older than his oldest child—they both started from scratch the day the baby arrived.

The first grade—gentlest slope in education.

Backing-up is 50 per cent of driving a car, or of talking.

When the insistent parent meets the resistant child, the result is a plate of cold food.

The first serious scar on a parent's ego is the discovery that at least twenty-five other kids in his child's grade are just as smart.

When the tank registers "empty," mothers and cars are always expected to go another mile.

Young daughter: "At my age, I think a girl should maintain a friendly altitude toward all boys."

"MY KITCHEN WAS A WRECK"

could be blocked off) and three windows took up considerable space. The windows were sealed, but there were enough cracks in them to let in some air.

We opened the door to the porch—a big, usable porch. Margaret Davidson took out her steel tape measure, Betty Goetsch picked up one end.

"The first thing is to get the measurements," they said.

The room turned out to be 13'3" by 14'3", the window sills were 27" high (a good 9" below normal counter height). The room was too large to use the four walls for a workable kitchen, too small to convert into two separate rooms.

"But I like space to move around in," said Jane Hill, looking hopeful.

The Hills' budget was small ($250). With the children and the baby to plan for, and in any case, in a rented house, expense had to be minimum. But they planned to do as much of the work themselves as possible, especially most of the painting. "Although my husband is no handy man," explained Jane brightly, "we can do the painting."

The landlord planned first to remodel the eighty-year-old building into apartments, but when the Hills took the house and he heard about the plans for the kitchen, he was most co-operative. He agreed to make major, necessary improvements before moving day:

1. A new automatic heating system, including all-year water heating.
2. A new cabinet sink.
3. New wiring to replace the ancient electric network.
4. Removal of abandoned stairs, making a closet in the space and more usable wall space beside the sink.
5. Strengthening of floors; in kitchen, plywood laid as a base for floor covering.
6. Patching of worst plaster.

For equipment, the Hills had a good-sized two-year-old electric refrigerator and an ample supply of pots and pans and cooking utensils. Jane was cooking on a borrowed range with a door that wouldn't stay closed for baking! The cupboards, cabinets and sink belonged in the house which was sold out from under them.

Several plans were suggested by the JOURNAL, and the kitchen was set up in models so Jane Hill could see which she liked best. She "simply loved" the one she finally chose.

"I like the counters to spread out on," she said. "I can't work when the table is cluttered." She shook back her lovely tawny hair and sat down on the floor. "I love a high counter for the children's meals, too, and I prefer stools. Their posture is better with stools. We have one piano stool and we can get them for a dollar apiece around here. As the children grow, we simply wind the stools down." Jane knows her own mind and speaks it quickly and with decision. "I like a compact kitchen to work in," she added, "and best of all, we can take it with us on our next move, except for the sink and floor covering, which we'll have to leave."

As far as the floor was concerned, the Hills were luckier than some, since Ray is connected with a big floor covering manufacturer. Sometimes there are remnants, or pieces with small defects, and sometimes the company makes extra yardages available to their employees at very reasonable rates. Ray has laid linoleum in baths and kitchens in other rented houses.

The plan Jane liked involved bringing the range, flanked by cabinets, out peninsula fashion from the wall between the two windows. This made a preparation and cooking area compact and efficient within the kitchen. The new sink went right where the old one had been, and the refrigerator on the same wall in front of the former stairway, now closed in. A base and wall cabinet fitted between sink and refrigerator.

The peninsula, with range and cabinet on the work side, had space behind for a full 8 counter for the children to eat at. "I love the counter," said Jane. "It's wonderful for commuting from cooking space to eating space and makes it easy to serve the youngsters. And thank heavens, they will have a place to sit while I am cooking that isn't in the way. I like to keep them with me in the kitchen."

THE beauty of the peninsula plan structurally is that it side-steps the need to cope with the 27" window sills. The open shelf extends halfway across one of the windows, but that is unobjectionable. Changing the windows would have been an expense the landlord would hardly undertake—and the Hills could hardly justify in a rented house.

"I'd like a mirror over the sink—I've seen it done in some of the JOURNAL kitchens. It will make it seem more spacious, and I can see what the children are doing behind me. And the large mirror can always be taken along on the next trek."

That same wall was made useful with open shelves. As Jane said, "Things just have to have a place where I can put them away."

The old floor-to-ceiling cupboard, now thoroughly cleaned and with all cracks sealed, takes on the magic of clean fresh paint, and will house Jane's dishes. A secondhand chest of drawers—handy for linens, towels and silver, and painted to match the kitchen—fits in the corner where the old rusty water tank stood. A wheeled table for serving either to the porch or dining room stands under the porch window.

Jane's favorite colors are green, black and white with a touch of red or yellow. "I don't like blue," she said firmly, "it looks too inefficient."

The idea of my favorite color being inefficient was certainly new to me, but Jane's color choice makes a gay and lively kitchen for a very gay and lively family.

"Now I know what a real kitchen revival is like," Jane says, and with that I heartily agree. For nobody would ever guess this spanking-fine kitchen was remotely related to the old dingy room in that house on Green Street.

And here is how the budget managed to come out pretty close to their $250:

GAS RANGE—a used model was found at a local dealer's. It was in good condition and has an oven-heat control.	$ 65.00
CABINETS—5 "mail order" unfinished wood cabinets bought knocked down. The four base cabinets were ordered minus tops.	108.77
WHEELED TABLE—of wood, for trundling food and dishes.	5.98
ENAMEL FLOOR COVERING available through Ray's company.	15.43
LINOLEUM FOR COUNTER TOPS same as above.	8.88
LABOR—building shelves, assembling cabinets; local prices are $1.50 an hour. About three days' work.	36.00
PAINTING—work done by Hills. Paint cost given.	9.00
PIANO STOOLS—four	4.00

It just goes to show, I thought, as I went out on the porch, that there really is no such thing as a hopeless kitchen. Just add plenty of ingenuity and enthusiasm, and the room that was a wreck becomes a new center for happy family living. THE END

At a luncheon in Cambridge the kindly Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes found himself seated next to the host's small daughter who sadly but firmly declined to be helped to any food. Finally he asked, "What's wrong, my dear, aren't you hungry?" "I am, very," she admitted. "Then why don't you eat?" "Because I haven't any fork." "Fingers," said Holmes, "were made before forks." "Not mine," replied the little girl glumly.

WOMEN IN POLITICS . . . NEW HAMPSHIRE LEGISLATORS

On week ends when the legislature is in session New Hampshire's women lawmakers bake, cook and keep house. Some make their own clothes and can vegetables from their gardens. But on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays they take their places in the gray granite Statehouse which towers over Concord, New Hampshire's capital city, to make laws and shape government for the people of their state.

They object to playing politics, but believe compromise is necessary to achieve results. "It's the hardest lesson for women in public life to learn," Representative Norma Studley said. Though they seldom err in parliamentary procedure, they show little interest in parliamentary maneuvering, according to House Speaker Lane Dwinell. "It isn't that the women don't understand maneuvering—they're just more interested in the issues."

Most colorful of the Democratic women lawmakers—who number only 10 per cent of the forty-six—are Senator Marye Caron and Representative Mary Dondero. Senator Caron, the only Democratic woman to be elected to the Senate from industrial Manchester, New Hampshire's largest city, is now serving her third term. On week ends, she keeps her nine-room home, constantly answers the telephone. Representative Dondero, the only woman to be mayor of Portsmouth, largest coastal city in the state, believes it takes a lot of courage to be a Democrat in a New England state, though she lost a Senate campaign to her Republican opponent by the slim margin of one vote! As Portsmouth's mayor, she built a $100,000 health clinic.

The women themselves believe they have done much to bring politics out of back rooms. "New Hampshire has the cleanest legislature there is," says pretty twenty-eight-year-old Barbara Winters, youngest of the women.

Senator Suzanne Loizeaux campaigned as a "Yankee Republican who does not believe in Santa Claus." For eight weeks attractive Margery Graves toured "from the clam flats of Seabrook to the Derry line," rapping on doors, introducing herself to total strangers. "Had it not been for my children, Jean and Joe—both University of New Hampshire students—at home licking stamps, mailing blotters and poring over road maps, I couldn't have won," she said. At midnight the decision hung on the returns from Exeter. "I'd hoped for 1300, I got 1800! That's the most exciting experience I can remember."

Of New Hampshire's lady lawmakers, twenty-nine are wives, twelve are widows and five are unmarried. They range in age from twenty-eight to seventy-five. The average of their ages is fifty-five. Most, like Mary Wastcoat, seem years younger. Twenty-seven are mothers—together they have eighty-seven children.

They come from all walks of life. Some are successful businesswomen; many were teachers. Suzanne Loizeaux, regarded by many as New Hampshire's outstanding woman lawmaker, brings to the legislature the experience and wisdom of fifteen years' newspaper publishing and editing. So influential is she in rallying support for measures that Senate Majority Floor Leader Charles Hartnett refers to her as the "unofficial majority floor leader." Against him, she defeated six amendments to kill or modify a school-aid bill. "Suzanne being for a bill will almost assure its passage," a Senate colleague remarked. Without exception, New Hampshire women legislators are leery of lobbyists and pressure tactics. "Never try to influence the vote of a woman," warns Representative Angeline St. Pierre. Though they cluster to fields which are predominantly in the woman's interest, they concern themselves with all kinds of problems.

Representative Barbara Winters introduced a resolution which would limit the Federal Government's taxing power. "Dean" of the women lawmakers, Representative Hilda Brungot, now in her tenth term, was the only woman who spoke for repeal of the 18th Amendment. "I did so because my brother died from drinking poisonous bootleg liquor and I couldn't bear to go on seeing young people endanger their lives and health." Mother of six children, Representative Brungot also introduced legislation which set up milk control in New Hampshire.

Senator Winifred Wild, from New Hampshire's playground region, takes a special interest in state planning and recreation problems; Senator Sara Otis, at seventy-five the senior of the lawmakers, heads the state's 2300-woman civil-defense unit; Senator Lena Read concerns herself with hunting-and-game problems. The White House Conference work of Representative Edith Atkins, wife of a Dartmouth professor, has brought her into public focus and earned her an award for public service from the University of Chicago.

The governor's faith in the ability of women in public office is evident in the number he has selected for the state's appointive offices—women serve on the boards of public welfare, education, health and probation departments, on the hospital-advisory council and the state library commission, and as trustees of many state institutions, such as the University of New Hampshire, the industrial school and the state hospital.

Once they arrive in a position of public responsibility, New Hampshire women believe in being effective. They report back to their constituents—they don't wait for people to come to them. They seek committee posts in fields which Governor Adams describes as "provinces particularly and pronounceably woman's": health, public welfare, state institutions, education. They are also members of the powerful appropriations, finance, judiciary and ways-and-means committees.

In spite of the feeling that "things go on in courtrooms which women ought not to hear," they succeeded in passing after twenty years of bitter fight a bill which permits women to serve on jury panels. They brought about equal pay to women for jobs equal to men's, dump and smog control, and broadened benefits for public workers.

When New Hampshire's women are not out campaigning for themselves, they lend a helping hand to other candidates, particularly those running for national election. Representative Marjorie Greene served as secretary of the 1948 New Hampshire "Dewey for President" campaign. Senator Marye Caron and Representative Mary Dondero were delegates to the 1948 Democratic National Convention in Philadelphia.

ARE YOU DIABETIC?

EIGHTH among the causes of death in the United States, diabetes is the only chronic disease for which there is a known control. If it is detected early, a patient can usually live a full, active and normal life.

Diabetes is more prevalent among women than among men. One out of every twenty-five women below the age of 50 will eventually contract the disease. It is found more often among married women.

The week of November 11–17 is Diabetes Detection Week. The American Diabetes Association, in co-operation with local medical groups in more than 700 communities, is going to test 5,000,000 persons as a part of its regular educational program. An estimated 1,000,000 persons are believed to have diabetes without knowing it.

Most of the women lawmakers take an active part in the party organization, both at state and local levels. Representatives Mabel Thompson Cooper, Ann Goodwin and Marjorie Greene and Senators Suzanne Loizeaux and Winifred Wild serve on the Republican State Committee. Working with Mrs. Viola Adams, charming, efficient chairman of the Republican Party's Women's Division, they have helped to interest other women in party activities and to bring in the vote on election day.

Until three years ago, the Women's Division functioned only at election time and had a reputation for doing nothing but eat. Now it does a year-round business—with an all-volunteer staff—planning "Legislative Days" and political schools to educate New Hampshire's electorate in the ways of their government. On "Legislative Days" the people from two counties at a time are invited to Concord, see the House and Senate in full force, visit important committee hearings, and hear about the inner workings of the Statehouse from an official, often the attorney general. At the political schools local committeewomen are taught to conduct rallies and to organize volunteer election-day workers. They are coached, then quizzed, on the fundamentals of election laws and registration processes.

Perhaps the most apparent reason why New Hampshire has so many women lawmakers is that these women are vitally interested in politics. For years they have spoken up, beside husbands and neighbors, at town meetings—a cherished New England custom. Some were attracted through the educational activities of the League of Women Voters, to which many belong. Others through party organizations—long before suffrage, New Hampshire women were ardent workers in national and state campaigns.

New Hampshire women are joiners, avid clubwomen. They belong to the Grange, church organizations, parent-teacher associations, Business and Professional Women's State Federation, and auxiliaries of all types. "For leaders of organizations and civic-minded women, the legislature is the next step up," Representative Irene Landers said.

Most women go into office without personal motives or political obligations. This is important to the shrewd, suspicious Yankee, who fears political taint in any form. Some say men can't afford to attend the legislature—New Hampshire pays her lawmakers a token salary of $200 a term plus mileage—but Representative Marjorie Greene protests: "The offices were not handed to women; they got them by campaigning by convincing people they are capable."

Most frequently mentioned criticism of New Hampshire's women lawmakers is their inability to take defeat. House Speaker Lane Dwinell believes: "They haven't quite the ability to come through the rough and tumble as easily as a man—they take rebuffs too hard."

This unwillingness to accept defeat is evident, too, in the reactions of the women themselves to seeking higher political office. In New Hampshire the possibilities are few: governor, governor's council (a five-man advisory board) or representative to Congress. Though most will return to their present posts as long as their constituents want them, only seven of the forty-six legislators would run for Congress "if the conditions were right"—meaning if they were financially able and if they would be elected. Three might "someday" try for governor. "Sue Loizeaux could make it," a male colleague believes.

However, that does not mean that New Hampshire's women lawmakers limit a woman's political effectiveness to the House and Senate. Almost without exception they would vote for a qualified woman to represent them in higher posts. What do they mean by qualified? "Twice as able as a man!"

Baby Comes Home

By Dr. Herman N. Bundesen
President, Chicago Board of Health

NOT long ago I was called in to examine a new baby on the day that its parents brought it home from the hospital. When I arrived I found the mother, fully dressed, caring for the baby. Dinner was well under way in the kitchen. An older child was scurrying about, running errands and "helping mother" generally. Father had gone to the grocery store. No extra help was in sight, but all was proceeding in as calm and orderly a way as though adding a new baby to the household were an everyday event. I thought to myself that this infant had the best chance there was of growing up a healthy, well-adjusted child.

Of course not every new mother is strong enough to take care of the baby and do other household tasks as soon as she gets home from the hospital, particularly nowadays when many mothers are sent home three or four days after childbirth. Nevertheless, this case illustrates what I consider is the most important thing when a new baby comes home: as quickly as possible, the household should settle down to a normal routine. An atmosphere of tension and emotional upset is quickly communicated to the infant, and sometimes may result in digestive and other disturbances. The baby cries more. This in turn worries the mother and other members of the family, so that the tension mounts in an endless, harmful spiral. The sooner the inevitable confusion that occurs in the first "settling in" is replaced by normal procedures, the better it will be for everyone.

But the household will not settle down of itself. Planning and organization that are made in advance of the baby's coming home form the principal factor in the smoothness with which the transition will be made. Well in advance of the time when you expect to go to the hospital, have all baby's paraphernalia collected and placed in such fashion that the fewest possible steps will be required in the processes of diapering, bathing and dressing. Thus, the bath equipment should be placed where the bath will be given; a stock of diapers should be handy to the crib; the diaper pail should be as easy of access as esthetics permit. (If you ask him, your doctor will probably give you a list of necessary items. Or you can find lists in books or pamphlets on baby care, or get one at the infants' department of a store.)

In most hospitals today, new mothers get one or more demonstration lessons in changing, bathing and dressing the baby—usually fearsome tasks if you tackle them for the first time on your arrival home, when you are weak and shaky. And of course mothers fortunate enough to have the advantages of the "rooming-in" plan now in vogue in an increasing number of hospitals where the mother assumes much of the care from the very first, feel quite like veterans by the time they leave. If you are going to a hospital where this kind of opportunity is not given, I would advise you by all means to practice routines of baby care on the infant of a friend or relative before your baby is born. Some experience in these techniques is a big point in cutting down the strains and worries of the first few days that you are on your own.

Two or three days before going home, check over the situation with your husband and make sure that all will be in readiness

Thank heavens it's only pneumonia!

Pneumonia!... A hundred years ago, the word rang like a death knell for the very young and the very old! As recently as 1930, the mortality rate from pneumonia of children 5 to 9 years of age, under very favorable conditions, was about 20 per 100,000; whereas today, it is slightly over 2—a decline of 90 per cent. Fatality rates in adequately treated children have declined to minute proportions.

Public health measures, improved nutrition, increasingly available hospital facilities, and chemotherapy have all played their parts in this fortunate result. Sulfadiazine and penicillin dramatically controlled most pneumonias caused by microbes; but it remained for aureomycin to provide high effectiveness against both the common pneumonias caused by microorganisms and those of unknown cause.

Teamwork has provided the answer to the problem of pneumonia. Long and tedious researches, participated in by Lederle, resulted in effective serums for pneumonia. Subsequent researches by Lederle evolved sulfadiazine and aureomycin. These, integrated with increasing popular understanding of pneumonia, have essentially eliminated pneumonia as a major cause of death in this country. This teamwork between laboratory and clinical research workers, industry, and the public-at-large is typical of American preoccupation with working to do things better, for more people, by everybody.

Through research, they live who would have died!

when you step inside the door with the baby. If you will not have a helper, the kitchen should be stocked with foods easy to prepare. If it can possibly be managed, the house should be spick-and-span, clean and orderly.

If you plan to breast-feed your baby—and you probably know by this time how strongly I advise that you do!—ask your doctor or the nurse for detailed suggestions about techniques that will help you after you get home. Your doctor will give you a diet list similar to the prenatal one, except that milk and other fluids will be even more strongly stressed. The nurse can show you how to empty your breasts with your thumb and fingers after the baby has finished eating. This is highly important, for thorough stripping of the breast at each feeding is one of the best ways to keep the milk gland working. And of course, if your baby has to have a formula, you will get this from the doctor, and have your husband lay in all the supplies you will need to make it.

What makes us discontented with our condition is the absurdly exaggerated idea we have of the happiness of others. —FRENCH PROVERB.

For the first weeks that you are at home, make it your first concern to see that baby is comfortable and happy, and that you conserve your own strength. If you have older children, let them do as much for the baby, and as much to help you, as lies within their powers. They will love being given responsibility at this exciting period, and it will give them a sense of importance which will help ward off jealousy and heartache because of the new arrival.

Get to bed early, steal a nap or two during the daytime, and when you begin to feel tired, lie down! If you follow this plan, I believe you will find baby sleeping more and crying less.

I know that many parents have no separate room for the baby, and must screen off a corner of their own bedroom as baby's domain. This does no harm, and in fact, having baby's bed close to yours in the first weeks may actually prove a convenience when it comes to night care. However, if baby's little snufflings and squirmings disturb your slumber, wheel the bassinet into the adjoining room when you go to bed. You will then be able to hear sounds that call for attentio but without being kept awake most of th night.

You probably already know that nowa days the new baby makes its own schedul with regard to eating, sleeping and wakin However, some mothers may be sent hom from the hospital with a three-hour or fou hour feeding schedule. In a number of case routine of this kind may be the reason fo the disturbed nights some parents go throug at first. If your baby cries and seems to b nuzzling about for food, feel perfectly free t offer the breast or bottle, even though he ha recently been fed, if your physician advis it. Babies whose hunger cries are give prompt attention are much more likely t wake only two or three times during th night, and to go back to sleep when hung is satisfied. If, on the other hand, he wish to sleep past his mealtim don't waken him.

But crying isn't alway from hunger. You w want to see if the litt fellow is soiled or uncon fortably wet. (It isn necessary to change hi for every slight dampnes but a sopping diaper wet, cold bed calls for speedy attentio Next you might try bubbling—that putting him upright over your shoulder a patting his middle back, to dislodge the g bubble that is likely to form when a sm baby eats.

If neither food nor a fresh diaper n bubbling soothes him, see if he is t warm or too cold, and change his positi in the bed. Or snuggle him for a while. T trip home and the new environment is good deal for a tiny baby to take. Som times he simply needs loving reassuran

Finally, if you are worried about anythi no matter how trivial it may seem, don't h itate to call your doctor!

More quickly than you would have ima ined possible, things will begin to set down. Meanwhile your strength will be co ing back, day by day. Just conserve it n to get your household on an even keel a to start your new life with baby in the healt iest, happiest way. Nothing else you will e do is more important than this.

surprised at myself now that I had accomplished what I had, for I had never realized that I might be good at business negotiations. At any rate, the whole affair was over and settled by the time Gilbert Frary had arrived in New York and I was willing and happy to see him in his office at three.

I understood, of course, there was going to be a scene, because Gilbert always liked scenes, but I was entirely prepared when I closed the door carefully behind me.

"Hello, Gilbert," I said. "How was it on the Coast? Did you come back with a lot of good ideas?"

I did not mean to be unkind about Gilbert's ideas. I only made the remark by way of a conversational opening.

"Sidney," Gilbert said, and his voice sounded choked and he pulled out a handkerchief and mopped his forehead. "Sidney, may I ask you a single question?"

"Why, yes," I said. "Go right ahead, Gilbert."

Gilbert Frary looked at me sadly. He appeared deeply hurt and deeply shocked, and perhaps he was. "My question can be phrased in a single word, Sidney," he said. "I don't want to be reproachful, Sidney. Perhaps there has been some mistake, and I still want to love your integrity and still idealize, if I can, a lovely human relationship. The question I want to ask you, Sidney, is 'Why?' Simply 'Why?'"

"Why what, Gilbert?" I asked.

Gilbert sighed. "Please, Sidney," he said, "don't turn the knife in the wound. For the last forty-eight hours I feel as though I have been impaled on steel."

"I'm sorry if you've suffered, Gilbert," said, "but then perhaps we have both s fered."

"Sidney," Gilbert said, "before we le this room I want everything to be as it w formerly between us. Why did you ever n trust me—of all people, Sidney?"

Since I had worked my way into driver's seat, there was no reason for a further turning of knives in wounds. "P haps I was wrong, Gilbert," I said. " sorry if I shouldn't have mistrusted you.

"That's a very lovely thing for you say," Gilbert Frary said. "I'm the one w should be sorry, Sidney. I should have derstood your integrity. I should never h suggested even whimsically that you sho speak commercials."

"That's all right now, Gilbert," I s "As long as I know that the sponsor is sa fied with the program, that clears everyth I'm sorry I had to go over your head, then, you were out on the Coast."

"I cannot see why you are so suspicio Gilbert said. "Suspicion does not coin with friendship."

"That's quite all right, Gilbert," I him. "Let's say that I lost faith in my but it's all right now. It helps me to k that George thinks I'm a valuable piec property in the face of competitive bidd As long as he agrees with my ideas, ev thing's all right. There's no reason for hi you to worry about the White Wall Rul Company."

Gilbert Frary sighed. "But it hurts m think of your thinking of it, Sidney," he s "All I've ever wanted is to have you basi and absolutely happy. Sidney, basically what was it that you said to George?"

I could thank Melville Goodwin for my answer. "I told him let's cut out the horsefeathers," I said, "and if he didn't like me, I had another job, and in the future I'd like to deal with him more closely personally. No reflection on you, Gilbert."

"But, Sidney," Gilbert said. "I've always thought of you as an artist to be protected. I always thought that you basically disliked business and did not understand it as an artist. What is it that will make you happy? Let us sit down and talk this over frankly as we always have."

We each sat down and we watched each other very carefully, but before we could get down to facts, the door opened. It was Miss Hamilton, Gilbert Frary's secretary.

"It's about Mr. Skelton," Miss Hamilton said. "Miss Maynard has brought an Army officer in to see Mr. Skelton, and he's outside now. He would have come in himself if I hadn't. I'm frightfully sorry, Mr. Frary."

"Who?" Gilbert Frary asked. "What officer?"

"His name is General Gooch," Miss Hamilton said. "He says he comes from the General Staff in Washington."

"You'll have to tell him I'm in an important conference," I began, but I knew that no civilian conference was important to General Gooch. Before I had finished speaking General Gooch himself had entered Gilbert Frary's sanctum.

"I hope I'm not interrupting anything," he said. General Gooch was in his uniform, wearing the sunburst of the General Staff. He looked at me. "I've got a plane waiting and the boss wants to see you in Washington before six o'clock."

"What boss?" I asked.

"The Chief's office," General Gooch said, "and we've got to step on it, Sid."

"Why didn't you telephone me?" I asked.

"I've been trying all morning," General Gooch said. "They wouldn't put me through. There's been a lot of horsefeathering around here, and I know Mr. Skelton will understand."

It was that beautiful complacency of the Army, and it touched me that General Gooch considered me as a part of it and knew I would understand.

"What's the matter, Goochy?" I asked. It was perfectly all right at this point to call him Goochy.

"It's all fouled up," General Gooch said. "It's about you-know-who, our mutual friend, and I suggested to the boss he'd better see you. It's highly delicate and highly personal. I hope this gentleman will excuse us."

"Listen, Goochy," I said, "I have to broadcast at seven o'clock. I'll go down with you afterward. I'll leave here at seven-fifteen, and that's the best I can do."

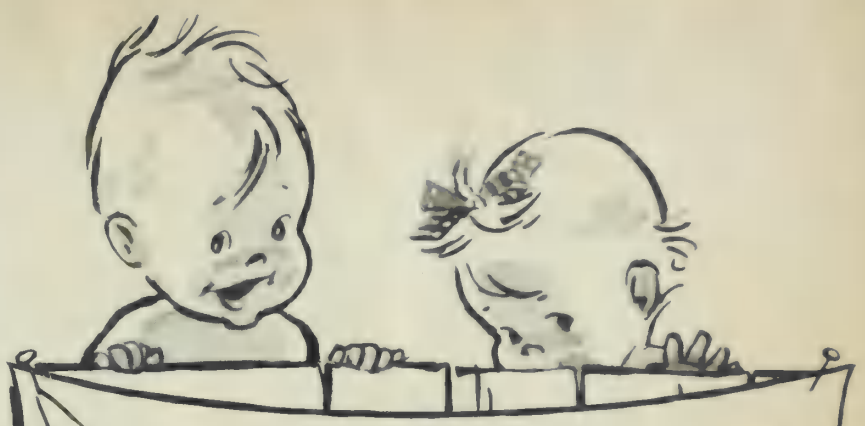
"All right," General Gooch said, "I'll do what I can with it. Come on, sister." He nodded to Miss Hamilton, and they both left.

It was almost as though the ceiling had fallen to put an end to our discussion, and it was too much to expect that either Gilbert Frary or I should be able to adjust ourselves to it casually.

"Sidney," Gilbert Frary asked me, "who is that man?"

"He's an acquaintance of mine," I said. "Don't bother about him now. He's gone, Gilbert."

"When I first met you I never dreamed that you had important military connections," Gilbert Frary said. "Can you tell me why they want you?"



"No," I said, "but it isn't anything personal, Gilbert."

Gilbert Frary sighed. "You have so many lovely connections, Sidney," he said, "that sometimes I have to pinch myself to be sure that I'm awake."

Perhaps it was just as well in the future for Gilbert to think of me as an enigmatic character, and he had certainly pinched himself since I had seen Burtheimer in Chicago.

"Where were we in our conversation," he asked, "before this interruption?"

"You wanted to make me happy," I said.

"That's what hurts me," Gilbert Frary said. "Since the very beginning of our association, Sidney, I have always been working for your happiness. If I have been overzealous or unintelligent, it was enthusiasm, Sidney, not lack of integrity."

There were polite ways of handling such a problem, as long as we both knew where we were and understood that there was iron beneath the velvet glove.

"I always love to admit it when I'm wrong," I said. "I never should have thought you were trying to run out on me. Can you forgive my suspicious nature, Gilbert?"

"Sidney," Gilbert said, "I love you for saying that. It's so absolutely like you."

"I love you, too," I said. "Now let's see how I can be happy." It was time to get tough, but there was still the velvet glove. "While this contract lasts," I said, "I'll negotiate all program problems personally with the sponsor instead of going through you. Perhaps we'd better put it in writing, Gilbert."

"Sidney," Gilbert began, "this is so unnecessary. Between friends, a gentlemanly agreement."

"A gentlemanly agreement between friends in writing," I said. "The next thing, you throw this Alan Featherbee out of this shop."

Gilbert laughed. It was a tragic, broken laugh. "Excuse me, Sidney," he said, "but this is so completely ludicrous. To think that this individual should have been the basis of our trouble. Why didn't you speak to me about him earlier?"

"Well," I said, "I'm speaking about him now."

Gilbert spoke gently and soothingly. "If it gives you a moment's mental ease, Sidney," he said. "And what else?"

"I want loyalty from the bottom up"—I was grateful to Mel Goodwin for this too—"I want you to fire Art Hertz and let me get my own writer. While we're on the subject, Miss Maynard had better go too."

"All I can ask is that single monosyllabic question," Gilbert said. "Why? Why didn't you take up all this with me long ago?"

I arose from my chair. The interview was over, and I shook hands with Gilbert, but I felt no personal triumph.

"It was all a great mistake," I said. "I didn't realize how valuable they thought I was in Chicago—but I love you, Gilbert." Love was different in the show business from other forms of love.

That hypocritical scene had given me a position and a security that I did not personally admire or covet, and if it had not been for Helen and Camilla, I knew that I would never have exerted myself. I was right back in the old groove again, but at least I had shown a flash of latent business instinct, and things would be simpler now. I had gained in what Gilbert Frary would have called stature.

BACK in my own office, I was conscious of Miss Maynard's avid curiosity, but there was no reason to discuss the future with her. Miss Maynard had bet on the wrong horse, and so had Art Hertz, and she would know what the score was in a very little while.

"That general," she said, "I mean General Gooch, is waiting for you inside, and he's had me put through two telephone calls to Washington. I hope it's what you wanted, Mr. Skelton. Miss Hamilton told me it was what you wanted."

"That's right," I said. "Thanks, Miss Maynard."

"Mr. Hertz has been asking for you," Miss Maynard said. "He wants to know when you would care to see the script."

"Tell him in half an hour," I told her.

I wanted to put those inevitable details away from me as far as possible, and I was glad that I could escape from them vicariously through the antics of Melville Goodwin. General Gooch was in my office looking sourly at the blown-up photographs around the wall, and it occurred to me that I would not have to tolerate those pictures any longer. I could have Helen redecorate the place, and Gilbert Frary would not have a word to say about it.

"Say, Sid," General Gooch said, "is that you riding on that elephant?"

"That's me on the elephant," I said, "but what are you doing in here looking at it, Goochy?"

"It's all right," he said, "we've got more time now. The meeting will be at Grimshaw's at twenty-one-thirty, and you have a room at the Mayflower."

It required a moment of mental arithmetic to gather that twenty-one-thirty meant half past nine that evening. He seemed to take it for granted that I understood what everything was all about.

"Boy, what a day!" he said. "I didn't know until around twelve hundred that Goodwin had blown his top."

"Maybe you'd better tell me about it, Goochy," I said.

"That's right," he said. "We've got to do something about Goodwin. Say, how much has Goodwin told you?"

For some reason he thought that I had understood the whole situation, and he seemed surprised when I told him that I did not understand anything.

"Oh," General Gooch said, "I thought you were in on this whole picture. Don't you know he's planning to marry this Mrs. Peale?"

"No," I said, "I didn't know that."

It was amazing to be surprised when the idea had been in the back of my mind for so long. Until the words were snapped at me, without trimmings, I had never honestly believed that things would go so far.

An old Turkish fable tells of a woman who was out walking and who was followed by a stranger. "Why do you follow me?" she asked him. "Because I have fallen in love with you," he replied. "Why? My sister, who is coming after me, is prettier than I am. Go and make flattering speeches to her." The man turned back and encountered a very homely girl. He ran and caught up with the first woman. "Why did you tell me an untruth?" he demanded. The woman answered, "I told no more of a falsehood than you. If you were in love with me, why did you turn back to look at another woman?"

"I didn't know," I said again. "I've heard him talk, but what makes you think he's serious?"

"Listen," General Gooch said, and he looked sharply around to see that the door was closed, "you've heard him speak of Lieutenant General Grimshaw, haven't you?"

"Yes," I said, "I've heard him speak of General Grimshaw, but he's retired now, isn't he?"

"That's right," General Gooch answered, "but Mel's very close to Grimshaw. This morning he told Grimshaw he's resigning from the service and marrying this Mrs. Peale."

"Has he told Mrs. Goodwin?" My own voice, when I asked, was as low as though we were in a funeral parlor.

"No," General Gooch said, "not yet. The Old Man made Mel promise to keep still until they've talked further. Then Grimshaw called up the office. Mel has some good friends and they want to get the picture. You see the layout now. There's a sort of committee that wants to find out how they can handle this Mrs. Peale."

It was not for me to argue that I could serve no good purpose by going to Washington. "All right," I said, "I'll go, Goochy."

"You're right you'll go," he said.

His tone implied that I was personally responsible for the whole problem, but at the same time he looked more cheerful. The thing was in the works now, as they used to say in the Army. General Gooch half closed his eyes, as though he could see the picture better by squinting.

"Now take Mel," he said. "He's a tactical genius, and he's a damn near perfect officer. I'm his junior and I'm talking out of school, but I'll tell you one trouble with Mel. He doesn't understand women like you and me."

This was the assumption that two men always made when engaged in such a conversation. We both were sophisticates who understood about women.

"Mel got married too young," General Gooch was saying. "That's what happens to a lot of kids. There's something about the Point that makes for early marriage. Mel was one of those boys, as they say around the club, who never looked at another woman. If he had busted loose when he was a captain or even a major—but when a man acts like a kid when he's fifty —— I don't know how we're going to handle this one—not that it hasn't happened to others. You can't stop him when he starts, and when he starts he never thinks about himself. I don't know why it is I love the guy."

There was a discreet knock on the door. It was Art Hertz with the script.

"Leave it here with me, Art," I said. "I'll call you if I want any changes."

I picked up the script and read the old familiar salutation: "Good evening, friends." It was vapid and insincere. I was measured and I was safe. I would never have the bravery or the splendid regardlessness of Melville Goodwin.

I WAS only asked to Washington to tell some high-ranking friends of Melville Goodwin confidentially what I knew of the character of Dottie Peale. Through it all I felt like a young officer appearing before a board. I was simply giving information, and I could read nothing from their expressions as they received it. They listened to me with flattering attention, but I could not gather what they were going to do, if anything.

General Grimshaw had only been a name to me until then, but he fitted perfectly the portrait I had made of him—a tall, deliberate man whose eyes were ice-gray like his hair. His years of complete authority echoed in every inflection of his voice. He would have stood out in any crowd. Although he was gracious, I felt nervous whenever he addressed me.

"I'm sure I speak for everyone here," he said, "when I say we are most grateful to you for taking so much time and trouble. You have shed some real light on this situation, Mr. Skelton. I think we can move on from here more confidently."

He did not say where they would move, but there was no doubt that they were not going to sit still, and when they were through with me I was whisked away.

"General Gooch," Foghorn Grimshaw said, "will you please find transportation to return Mr. Skelton to his hotel, and then join us here again?"

"Thank you, sir," I said. "Good night."

An iron curtain had fallen and that was all. I was glad to be leaving that conference. I still felt constrained and unnatural when I tried to get to sleep that night. Even in the morning I still felt that I had been a witness at an inquest. I had told them what they had asked me and if they were taking General Goodwin to pieces and putting him together again, I had nothing further to do with the process. As General Gooch had said, Melville Goodwin was in the works, and I was very glad that I was not in the works with him.

What with a legal conference and then a correspondents' dinner in the evening, after returning from Chicago, I had not been able to get out to Savin Hill since that Washington broadcast, so there was a great deal I had to tell Helen about Gilbert Frary and the new arrangements when I finally did get home on Friday. It was hard to explain everything in order to Helen, who had been there quietly in the country.

"Melville Goodwin's going to resign from the service and marry Dottie Peale," I said.

"Oh, dear," Helen said. "What about Muriel Goodwin?"

I told her that she did not know it yet, or at least I did not think she did.

"That's so silly of you," Helen said. "Of course she must know something. Sid, Dottie Peale called up this afternoon. She invited herself out here for lunch tomorrow. There must be some connection."

"I hope you told her she couldn't come," I said.

"Sid," she answered, "I couldn't do that—but the funny thing was, she never said a word about any of this. She didn't even sound excited; but then, that's like her, isn't it?"

"Yes," I said, "it's like her." Of course Dottie had to talk to someone.

"Poor Muriel," Helen said. "After everything she's done for him, and she's just the right wife for him too. After all the years she's spent making both ends meet and working her fingers to the bone. It isn't fair. Do you know what I'd do if I were Muriel Goodwin?"

"Listen, Helen," I said, "let's not get theoretical."

"Well, I think I'd kill Dottie."

"Now, Helen," I said, "don't be so conventional."

"When I think of her sitting right here, crocheting those poor little washcloths for the new place where she was going to live," Helen said, and I found her looking at me indignantly instead of at the fire. "Well, if it were I, I'd step out with somebody else and find a new life for myself so fast you wouldn't know it."

"I don't know why you bring me into it," I said, "and besides, don't you think that Mrs. Goodwin is too far along in years to start a new life?"

"Well, I'm not too far along," Helen said. "You'd be surprised if I told you of all the chances I had when you were overseas. Yes, you'd be surprised."

Our discussion had broken into fragments. We were no longer pinned down to anything definite, but then there was always a species of logic in Helen's indefiniteness.

"Listen," I said, "are we talking about you and me or about the Goodwins?"

"Darling," Helen said, "I just want to talk. I suppose I'm provincial and old-fashioned, and that's why I can't seem to get into the spirit of Anglo-Saxon monosyllables, but she's a—well, never mind. I've always tried to be nice about her, but she really is a—well, never mind. There's only one good thing about this, if you want to call it a good thing. It might have been you, if she hadn't got all mixed up with the Army."

"Me?" I repeated, and I felt righteously indignant.

"Darling," Helen said, "don't you think I had a right to be worried when I heard that you and Dottie were on that trip to Paris? You know she never wants to let go of anything. You were a piece of personal property, and she was simply furious when we got married."

"Why, no," I said, "she wasn't. She was awfully nice about it. She said how glad she was for me. Don't you remember?"

"Oh, Sid," Helen said, "don't you know anything about Dottie? It would have been you if it hadn't been poor old Mel Goodwin, and she would have said it was all your fault. She's always been furious at me, and we hate each other. I really don't see how I can be nice to her tomorrow."

I REMEMBERED that long flight over the ocean with the VIP's in the darkened plane. I remembered that rococo sitting room in the Ritz in Paris and Dottie whistling in the bedroom. If Major General Goodwin had not been there, Dottie and I would have been a long way from home. Then I remembered those adjoining bedrooms in that bleak hotel in Northern France when Dottie had asked me to kiss her in a friendly way.

I pulled myself back into the present. Farouche had dropped his rubber ring on my foot and his doing so relieved the tension. He wagged his beautifully brushed tail expectantly, and Helen looked benign. When I played with Farouche it meant that I was getting used to everything.

"Darling," Helen said, "we really ought to think about having another baby."

I knew exactly why the idea had occurred to her at that moment. She was not thinking of the nursery and the bassinet and the good life as much as she was thinking of Dottie Peale.

IN the morning I remembered immediately that Dottie Peale had invited herself to lunch. Ever since we had bought the place in Connecticut she had been saying that she must drop in to see us. Helen had always begged her to wait until everything was decorated, and Dottie had always understood perfectly. She would not drop in suddenly, although she could not wait to see Helen in her new setting. I wished that I did not know so well what Dottie would say and think.

Ever since I had worked on the night shift of the newspaper, I had been able to sleep through a morning, and it was after eleven when I awoke. Then I saw that it was raining and that the bare trees were dripping coldly and moistly against a grim gray sky. Helen's bed was empty. I saw that Camilla was standing beside me.

"Daddy," she said, "you look so funny waking up."

For that matter, Camilla looked pretty funny herself. She was wearing her jodhpurs and her tiny tweed coat and little stock and a gold horseshoe pin. Her hair was in a single braid, clubbed and tied with a black ribbon.

"Hello," I said, "are you going riding?"

Camilla giggled and nodded.

"You can't," I said, "it's raining."

"Oh, daddy," Camilla said, "don't be so silly. Don't you know that Mr. Delaney has his Saturday class in the indoor ring? Mummy told me to tell you to wake up. Oscar's bringing up your breakfast."

"Where's your mother now?" I asked.

"She's arranging things downstairs," Camilla said. "She acts as if there's going to be a luncheon party."

"It isn't a real party," I told her, "just one lady."

"Well," Camilla said, "good-by, daddy. Miss Otts is waiting for me, but I'll be back for lunch."

The wailing hum of a vacuum cleaner sounded in the living room as I came downstairs. Mr. Brown had been brought in from outside to do the rugs, and next he would do the green carpet on the stairs. Mrs. Griscoe, the cleaning woman, was dusting the library. Oscar and Hilda were setting the dining-room table and Henry was waxing the hall floor. Helen was arranging flowers and supervising. It was to have all the earmarks of a simple informal lunch—just the Skeltons at home.

Helen was wearing a whipcord suit that made her look as efficient as Dottie Peale.

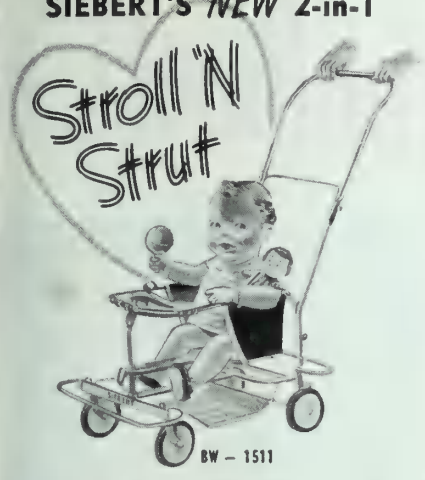
"Everything looks all right, Helen," I said. "Why don't you leave it alone?" It was a useless remark, but the activity made me nervous.

"I don't see how you can sleep in the morning," Helen said. "I've been up since seven. You know how particular Dottie is. She always sees everything."

"All right," I said, "but you'll get it looking like a feature piece in House and Garden."

Dottie had never let anyone forget that Helen had once worked on a similar magazine.

"Sidney," Helen said, "I wish you would go upstairs and put on some older clothes and then you won't look so self-conscious."



"But aren't we both?" I said. "Isn't this whole effort self-conscious?"

"Oh, Sidney," Helen said, "please go upstairs and read the papers. I'm busy and I've got a headache."

Upstairs I changed into a suit I had owned for years. I tried to concentrate on the morning news while I listened to the dripping of the rain but instead I remembered how glad

Most women will forgive a liberty, rather than a slight; and if any woman were to hang a man for stealing her picture, although it were set in gold, it would be a new case in law; but if he carried off the setting, and left the portrait, I would not answer for his safety. —COLTON.

Dottie had seemed to be when Helen and I were married and all the kind things she always said about Helen, and I also recalled the kind things Helen had said about Dottie. At least my mind was off Melville Goodwin, now that I was the vertex of a triangle. It was not Dottie's fault, I was thinking, that she was a girl who could never let anything go entirely. She was a perfect example of the type that could never get on with women, and also she was the type that never got on for long with men.

"Sid," I heard Helen calling, "Sid, please come downstairs. She's here." Helen had seen before I had that Dottie's town car, driven by Bernard, that chauffeur of hers, was turning into the white-fenced drive.

The car was at the door. I held an umbrella for Dottie while Bernard helped her out—not that she ever needed to be helped. Helen had been right to wear something tailored. Dottie, too, was in a suit, cool and austere, with a topaz brooch at her throat, no noisy bangles, an honest, simple girl.

"Darling," she said, "I'm so glad to see you. How's the country squire?"

"Well, well," I said, "and how's the little city mouse?"

Dottie glanced at me sideways. "Darling," she said, "I can't wait until I see absolutely everything. It all looks so exactly like you."

"That's just what I've always felt about Seventy-second Street," I said, "but I never could bring myself to tell you."

Dottie gave my arm a savage pinch. "Shut up," she said. "Let's come in out of the rain. . . . Helen, darling, how beautiful this is!"

"Dottie, dear," Helen said, "it's so sweet of you to come out through all this rain."

Helen and Dottie Peale were being very civilized indeed. There was no rough stuff, scarcely an awkward moment. There were no roundhouse swings or smacks of gloves. There were no cuts from glancing blows. They were so glad to see each other, so fond of each other, so mutually admiring, that it was hard to believe what Helen had said about Dottie. Dottie could always see everything without appearing to notice, and I knew she was not missing anything.

"Darling," I heard her say, as she and Helen walked arm and arm into the living room, "no wonder they were sorry to lose you from that magazine. I had lunch with Diana Paul only last week, and Diana was saying that there was no one like you, with restraint and taste combined with so many new ideas. What fun you must have had fixing everything. It's all so perfect. It's—it's like a stage set for that old play, Berkeley Square, isn't it? And yet it isn't Berkeley Square, dear. It's absolutely you, and you were so right in not consulting Sidney's taste, because Sidney has no taste, has he? It's you in your own setting."

"If you say so," Helen said, "everything must be all right, Dottie, dear. I've been on pins and needles to know what you would think of the house."

Dottie laughed affectionately. "Darling," she said, "you must really learn not to mind what other people think. Hew to the line and let the chips fall where they may, but then there isn't a chip around here anywhere."

"All in order because of you, dear," Helen said. "Sidney doesn't let me forget your love of order for a minute." Then she, too, laughed affectionately. They both seemed to be having a wonderful time.

Dottie said, "Darlings, I can't tell you how I love being here. Where shall I sit? I don't want to perch on the wrong museum piece."

"Darling," Helen said, "I've never known a museum piece that didn't suit you."

"Now, girls," I said, "let's all take it easy."

Both girls were sitting up straight with hands folded in their laps and ankles crossed, like girls in dancing school waiting for a partner. They both looked austerely charming and very pretty, but I thought that Dottie's face looked drawn. The gray light from the north windows was not flattering, and she did not look as happy as she should have, considering everything. I was tempted to ask her what the news was, as I would have if we had been alone, but then there were Helen and the amenities. Just then Farouche came in. He was brushed and he had a new bowknot on the top of his cranium, but like Dottie, he seemed worried and distrait.

"Oh," Dottie said, "where did you come from, you lovely handsome man? Oh, woozums, woozums, woozums!" And she sank down on her knees and threw her arms around Farouche.

Though Farouche submitted to Dottie's embrace like a gentleman, he knew instinctively that her behavior was not genuine, and so did I. Dottie would not have gone overboard in such a manner if she had not been under some sort of tension. I was growing very tired of the feminine character, and I was thinking how many valid reasons there were for men's bars and men's clubs. Helen and I looked at each other and she raised her eyebrows slightly.

The embrace was over. Dottie was back in her chair again and "Woozums" was wandering about the room distractedly, like an old man looking for his glasses.

"What is he doing?" Dottie asked. "Does he want to go out, Sidney?"

"I think he's looking for his rubber ring," I said.

"Oh," Dottie said, "I wish everyone weren't always looking for something. Is he happy when he gets it?"

"Yes," I said, "he seems to be."

Dottie said, "I wish I could settle for a rubber ring."

For the first time since Dottie's appearance her voice was kind and natural, but her remark was surprising, because it seemed to me that she had finally settled for a rubber ring herself. I had been exposed to all of Dottie's moods. I could even classify them cold-bloodedly, and she knew I could.

"Sid," she said, "did you tell Helen about Gilbert Frary?"

"Yes," I said, "and I won't forget what you did for me, Dot."

"Darling," Dottie said, "anything I did was for Helen too. It wasn't much—just calling up some people. There's so little anyone can do for anyone else basically. . . . And Helen—in case you don't know it, Sid's a very good guy."

"I always had the same idea," Helen answered, "but it's nice to have it confirmed."

The shift in conversation made me wince. "I'm wonderful," I said, "but don't be so patronizing about it."

"I knew you'd have the subtlety but I didn't know you'd have the guts to do what you did with Frary," Dottie said.

"I couldn't let the home team down," I told her. "If you want to know, I've learned a lot about guts from General Goodwin."

This seemed like a graceful way of bringing Melville Goodwin into the conversation. "I kept thinking of Mel," I went on, "when I was slugging it out with Gilbert and the boys. You know the way Mel puts it. You estimate the situation and then you act."

Dottie looked at me as though I had been crudely clumsy, and then she blushed. "Never mind about Mel now," she said. "Helen, darling, I'm awfully glad you've done so much for Sid."

I always disliked sentiment, and the whole thing seemed to be getting out of hand. I saw Helen's eyes open wide in her astonishment.

Dottie said, "I don't know what's the matter with me." First there had been that scene with Farouche, and now she was dabbing her eyes with her handkerchief. "I don't know what's the matter with me," she said again. "Don't say anything."

Fortunately I knew exactly what to say. "Come on," I said, "and pull your socks up, Dot."

"I'm all right now." Her teeth glittered in her most impeccable smile. "Don't look so worried," she said, "it's just nerves, combined with all this sanitary Chippendale. Excuse me, Helen darling."

It was like pulling a rabbit from a hat. It was hard to believe that anything had upset Dottie.

"Why, here's Camilla," I heard Helen saying. "Come in, dear, and shake hands with Mrs. Peale and don't forget to curtsy."

I was singularly moved by the sight of Camilla, out of her riding clothes and all prepared by Helen, like the house, for the visitation of Dottie Peale. She looked so shy and so small in her little patent-leather slippers and her smocked dress of liberty silk, that for once I seriously felt that I was her father. What might happen to me did not have much value as long as I had done something for Camilla. It was like arriving somewhere safely.

"Why, darling," Dottie Peale said, "how sweet you look. Won't you give me a big kiss, darling?"

Camilla complied politely and restrainedly, and then with the unerring instinct of a child she firmly disengaged herself from Dottie Peale.

"Oh, Helen," Dottie was saying, "she is so sweet, just a pocket edition of you, dear."

Then Camilla moved to where I was sitting and stood leaning lightly against me. I put my arm around her and held her tight.

"Yes," I said, "Camilla does look quite a lot like Helen."

"I've always wanted to have a little girl," Dottie said.

She always wanted something, but it was not like her to drop all barriers in this way. I had never seen her so insecure, and I could think of nothing to say to fill the embarrassed gap of silence.

By now there was no doubt that Dottie Peale was deeply worried about something, and obviously it was something which she did not wish to discuss in front of Helen. She ate very little all through luncheon, although she said several times how delicious everything tasted. In the living room afterward she did not touch her coffee, though she had been careful to ask if she could have some saccharin instead of sugar.

"Helen, dear," she said at last, "would you mind if I took Sid away somewhere for a little while? I don't mind his repeating everything I say, but I don't seem to be able to say it to you both at once."

From the quick way Helen answered, I knew that she was as glad as I that the suspense was over. Why didn't we go into the library, she suggested. She seemed to be turning me over to Dottie very willingly.

As soon as we reached the library, I knew exactly what Dottie thought of the whole layout, and it placed an undue strain on my loyalty to see her gazing at the wall of the English-gentleman's books. All at once she put her arm through mine as though we both were lonely.

"Poor Sid," she said. "This isn't what you ever wanted, is it, darling?"

"Not exactly," I answered, "but it doesn't really matter. It's only a minor detail, Dot."

"I know it is," she said. "Sid, I'm awfully glad for you, I really am. And the patter of little feet. This won't be such a bad place for The Children's Hour." I wished she did not see everything and know everything. There was never any intellectual privacy when I was with her.

"All right," I said, "that's one way to put it, Dot."

"Darn you," she said, "don't try to be slick about it. All right, I'm jealous of you. I hate you and still I'm so glad for you. How did it ever work this way? Oh, I'm so unhappy, darling."

Then she threw her arms around me and pressed her head against my shoulder, but not the way she had with Farouche. It was an excellent thing that Helen was not there.

"Sid," she said, "please hold me for just a minute. You've got to help me, Sid."

"Help you about what, Dot?" I asked.

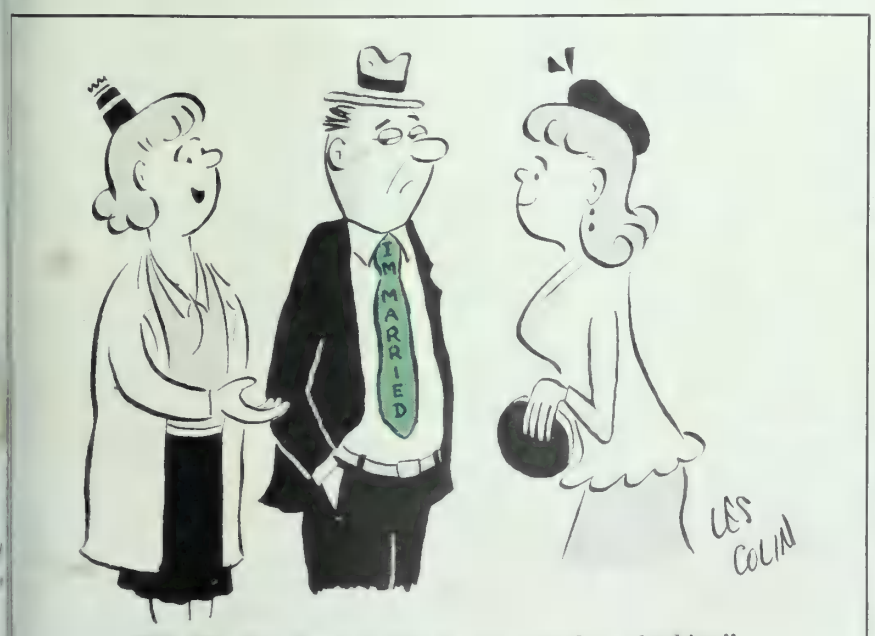
She pushed herself away from me, but she still held my hand. "All right," she said. "Of course you know what. That brass-hat general of yours, Major General Melville A. Goodwin, and to the junk pile with him! Do you know what he wants! He wants me to marry him and now the whole Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington are beginning to expect me to. Oh, Sidney, I can't. You've got to help me, Sid."

I had never seen her look so empty or defeated. Her words had all her old sophistry, but they had taken a lot out of her. She turned away from me and took a few unsteady steps toward the armchair by the library fireplace, and curiously enough it was the chair that Melville Goodwin had always used. She slumped into it heavily, with none of her beguiling schoolgirl posture. Her jacket, so carefully tailored to show the arrogant boyish slimness of her figure, was a mass of untidy wrinkles. Her skirt had ridden up above one knee, showing the edge of her slip with its meticulously embroidered border, and nothing could have confirmed her wretchedness more eloquently. For once in her life for a few moments Dottie did not care how she looked.

"Didn't it ever occur to you," I said, "that he might have honorable intentions?"

"Oh, Sid," she said, "please don't. Please say you're fond of me."

"All right," I said, "I'm fond of you, but stop showing your slip."



She arranged things in a single indescribable motion. Suddenly the wrinkles of the jacket were gone and the slip was gone and the skirt and the nylon stockings were all synchronized again.

"Darling," she said, "it's such an awful mess. You are always so right about everything."

"So right about what?" I asked her.

"Oh, about the whole business," she said. "You never did approve of it, did you? Not even back in Paris."

"No," I said, "of course I didn't."

"He likes hand-painted ties, so I painted one for him."

"I don't see why you couldn't have told me more about him," she said. "I never knew he would take everything so seriously."

"Didn't you want him to be serious?" I asked.

"Sid," she said, "won't you please sit down and listen? I want to be fair, darling, absolutely fair. Of course I didn't know it would come to this, and he was so unhappy and completely maladjusted. Sid, I only wanted to make him happy."

I sat down in the armchair opposite her.

"And so you made him still more maladjusted," I said.

"Darling," she answered, "I wish you'd try to pull yourself together and understand. Of course I know he loves me, but I didn't know he would love me in this way. He's so undeviating, darling. Do you remember that poem he keeps reciting? 'Push off and sitting well in order smite ——' I'll scream if I hear it again. And did you ever see those damn clothes of his—that tweed coat and his double-breasted suit?"

I did not answer, but they mattered. Disillusion always came from details.

"I don't mean to be unkind," she said, "and I know part of this is my fault. Of course I was carried away. I still love him—in theory—but it's all too much for me to manage. Sidney, please be kind."

"All right," I said, "I'm being kind."

I could not unsnarl the raveled ends of her meaning. Her love was always limited, and perhaps she recognized this as she sat there wretchedly in my library, twisting her hands nervously, pulling at the loose edges of her life.

"Darling," she said, "it did seem possible at first. I want you please to believe that. I don't suppose I ever thought things out clearly. I didn't want to think, because I was happy. Everything would have been possible if he'd only been a little more like other people, more like you and me, but he's so damned—so damned honest, darling."

Waldo Pierce, the American painter, once presented the concierge of his Paris apartment with a turtle. Next day he secretly replaced the turtle with one slightly larger. He kept this up until the turtle assumed monstrous proportions. The old lady was enchanted with her pet's rapid growth. Then the artist reversed the process. The turtle grew smaller and smaller. The lady was bereft; she stayed up nights nursing it. Pierce kept it up until the poor woman almost had a nervous breakdown. Then he confessed. Unfortunately, we have no record of what she said or did.

There was truth in all her sophistry, and her saving grace was that she could see it occasionally. Melville Goodwin was more honest than either of us could ever be.

"Darling," she said, "I don't know why I didn't see this coming. Of course we did make plans, but I didn't think he believed them any more than I did. Do you know what he actually wants now? He wants to resign from the service and for us to go away somewhere alone together. He wants us to take a little bungalow or something and live in Carmel, California. And that isn't all. Do you know what happened yesterday? Yesterday another general came, an old one. He was polite—something like a priest. Damn it, give me a cigarette."

She was feeling better or she would not have asked for one, but her hands were shaking.

"WHAT was his name?" I asked.

"Oh, he was someone Mel always talks about," she said. "Grimshaw, Foghorn Grimshaw. He wanted to tell me all about Mel and he wanted to congratulate me, darling, but they don't want Mel to leave the service. They want us to wait until everything can be arranged properly. Time, he kept saying, time. But Mel wants to go to Carmel or else he wants to be somewhere with troops. Oh, I'm ashamed."

"Yes," I said, "you ought to be. You haven't any right to ruin Goodwin's life."

"Darling," she said, "I don't want to ruin his life. I'd much rather have ruined yours. Sid, aren't you going to help me?"

I felt a sudden surge of revolt. "No," I said. "If you feel that way, hurry up and tell him so."

"But I don't want to tell him," she said. "There must be some other way. I don't want to hurt him . . . and—he believes in me. No one's ever believed in me the way he does."

"He'd better stop," I said.

It was exactly like her, I was thinking, not to be able to say yes and not to be able to say no, and to try to put the burden on someone else.

"Sid," she said, "will you tell him?"

"No," I said. "Dot, you ought to be ashamed."

"I told you I was ashamed," Dottie said. "Can't you be kind to me, Sidney?"

"No," I said. "Why not face it? You've been through this with other men."

"Darling," Dottie said, "that isn't fair. It wasn't the same with you and me. We had other things on our minds."

WE must have both thought about this through a second or two of painful silence. You always had to pay for every party.

"I wasn't referring to you and me," I said. "Let's forget it, Dot."

Dottie said, "Darling, no one else I've ever known ever threw in everything the way he has. Darling, he must fight like he can love."

I thought of the young Melville Goodwin, just married, just out of the Point, just before he went overseas, walking down Sixth Avenue with Muriel and hearing that old song of World War I—"If you can fight like you can love, good night, Germany."

"Well," I said, "maybe you ought to throw in everything."

Dottie was sitting up straight. She had picked up all her frankness and confusion and had packed it all away. She might have been talking to her lawyer about business matters.

"Sid," she said, "are you going to let me down?"

"No one's letting you down, Dot," I said. "I can't pick up the check."

She stood up and I stood up. "I hate your guts," she said. "I guess I'd better be leaving now, but I do want to say good-by to poor Helen. Will you have someone call Bernard, please?"

I opened the library door, and she walked past me. She hated my guts, but then, she had hated them a good many times before.

"Helen, darling," I heard her saying, "I'm terribly sorry I kept Sidney so long. I had no idea that it was so late, and I have to be back in time for dinner. Sidney's calling Bernard."

I was glad to tell Helen about it all, instead of keeping it to myself. At least there was a chance now of putting the pieces together again. The worst of it was that I had once been almost like Melville Goodwin. Thank God she was gone, I kept thinking.

"You ought not to be so hard on her," Helen said. "She can't help it, Sid."

It all went to show the risk of interfering with other people's lives. Dottie and the Goodwins could work it out themselves from now on.

It was a cold, windy night on Monday. The house looked even larger than it had when I had first seen it, now that the trees were bare. Its size engulfed me suddenly, almost like a return to consciousness, as I heard Henry asking me what the orders would be for tomorrow.

"I'll tell you what to do," I said. "Ask Mrs. Skelton what the plans are tomorrow morning."

I wanted to get inside out of the cold, and when I was in the hall, Oscar took my hat and coat.

"I've had my dinner," I told him. "Where's Mrs. Skelton?"

"She's in the living room, sir," Oscar said.

I could not understand why Helen had not come into the hall to meet me as she usually did after my trip from the city. I felt a little neglected, seeing that the house had been Helen's idea. I was thinking longingly of the place where we had lived in the Fifties, when I reached the living room.

"Hello, dear," Helen said. "I didn't know you'd be so late. Here's Muriel Goodwin."

Helen spoke as though I were Camilla being prepared for company, and I had certainly not expected any. Not until Helen had mentioned her did I see that Mrs. Melville Goodwin was seated on the sofa, working on another washcloth, finishing some border stitches quickly so she could leave it and greet me. It was the washcloth as much as the apparition of Muriel Goodwin that confused me. My first thought was how utterly inappropriate, under the circumstances, it was for her to be crocheting another of those things, until I remembered that the threads of Melville Goodwin were being removed from Dottie Peale's tapestry.

She held out her hand. "I just called up rather on the spur of the moment," she said. "Helen was most hospitable and sweet and asked me to come out for the night. I had run up to New York to see Pamela Hardee, and then I thought of you and Helen, and I thought it might be better for Melville if he were by himself a day longer."

It was an effort for me not to look questioningly at Helen, but the situation was obviously under control, and Muriel Goodwin was the chairman of the board conducting the meeting.

"I'm awfully glad to see you," I said.

"I'm glad, too," Mrs. Goodwin answered. "I only had such a short glimpse of you in Washington, Sidney. I was just telling Helen I wished you were both in the service, too, but it's funny, I still keep on feeling as though you were."

"Sidney," Helen said, "I think I'd better go upstairs and leave you both together."

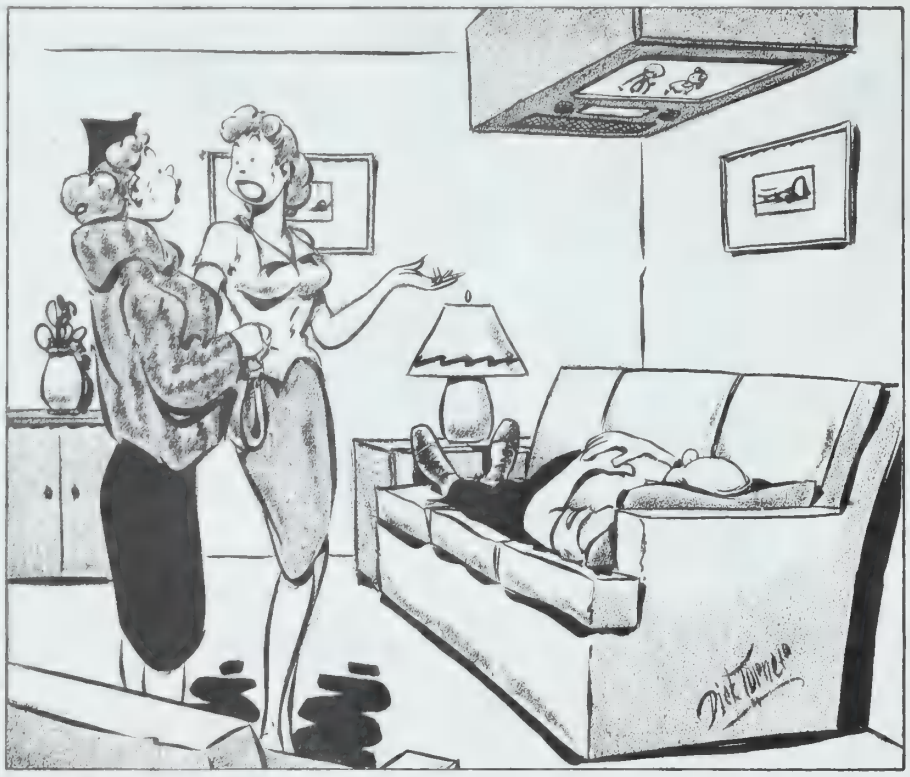
"Don't run away, dear," Muriel Goodwin said. "Of course I'm here to talk about the General—but there's nothing you shouldn't hear."

"Sidney," Helen said, "I wish you'd please sit down," and she sounded almost like Dottie Peale. "I don't know why I can't ever stop Sidney from prowling around the room."

"It's all right," Mrs. Goodwin said, and her smile was sympathetically gracious. "Let him if he wants to. Mel often does, when I'm talking things over with him."

"Oh, no," I said, "I'm sorry," and I found a chair and pulled it near the sofa where Mrs. Goodwin sat. She waited for me, giving me time to settle myself, and I found myself doing this hastily and guiltily, like a young officer called suddenly into conference. She was patient. She even waited a moment longer than was necessary, and then she spoke again.

"I know you're both fond of Melville," she said. "He has a gift for making friends. I've been very touched by how many people are concerned about him at present. Now General Grimshaw—— Did Melville ever mention him—Foghorn Grimshaw?"



She smiled again, this time at Helen, and the Army had taken over. She was no longer the general's wife dropping in to call. She was closer now to being the spokesman at an Army conference sketching in the background.

"You know, dear," she said to Helen. "Sidney made a very favorable impression on General Grimshaw. He went out of his way to speak of Sidney, and Goochy likes Sidney—he was Melville's old chief of staff in France—and Robert liked him so much too. That's why I can't help feeling that you're all in the family." And she smiled at me again, as though I were a bright young officer who had a future.

At least Helen and I knew where we were. Muriel was taking over, and she was running things very well. She was not even being a brave little woman. It was not fair, perhaps, but in a way I could sympathize with Melville Goodwin. He had been away a long time and had become used to running things himself.

"I admit that General Grimshaw and General Gooch, too, know the General very well," Muriel Goodwin was saying. "But I know the General rather well myself, and I've known him longer than anyone else. I've seen him grow. Now they are talking to me of waiting, and of time curing everything. Of course I know all about waiting. You have to, if you're married in the service, but I would really like to know something definite, and no one will tell me."

She had woven a large part of the General's life, and now at last she was getting somewhere. I was forgetting where we were. I was following again in the parade after Melville Goodwin.

"Of course a part of me thinks of Mel as a person and as my husband," she said, "but I suppose always, ever since I was a girl in Hallowell, another part of me has always thought of what he means to other people, and what he stands for. . . . Now I've had a good deal to do in making the General what he is."

I was afraid she would speak of self-sacrifice, and it would have disappointed me if she had, but she went straight ahead marshaling her facts.

"Melville has his record, and no one can take that impersonal part of him away from me. He's something more than my Melville Goodwin. Do you see what I mean when I say I don't think of him entirely as a person?" She paused and turned her head toward me abruptly. I had often thought how pretty she must have been when she was a girl, but I had no impression of faded beauty now. Although her bluish-gray hair and her plump figure made her look older than Melville Goodwin, she also looked wiser. The motion of her hands stopped. She laid the washcloth gently on her knees, and waited patiently to be sure I understood.

"You mean," I said, "that you think of him as Government property?"

She nodded to me quickly and pulled a long loop of thread through with her hook. "I hoped you'd say that," she said. "I'm so glad you understand, and I do hope Helen will. I suppose I'm talking from the point of view of other service wives, and it's hard for people on the outside sometimes to see it. Army wives really have as much to do with the service as the men. Now take my General. I don't think Melville would ever have made general if I hadn't prodded him sometimes. I wish Melville didn't know this too. We might have been happier if I hadn't been so ambitious—but at least I've done something for the service, and the service is more important than Mel or me."

MURIEL GOODWIN stopped again, and memories of the Goodwins in Tientsin, Schofield, Panama, Benning and Bailey crowded uninvited into the living room. Certain memories of the Goodwins had become as vivid to me as the footage of a documentary film. There was little Mel Goodwin fighting that Stickney boy at school, Mel Goodwin studying algebra with Muriel Reece, the first kiss at the Sunday-school picnic, Goodwin at the Point, and Goodwin, captain of Company A. I was with him near Château-Thierry when the machine guns opened up. I encountered him walking back wounded in North Africa, and I could hear the enlisted man saying that he was a fighting so-and-so, those words that he wanted on his tombstone. Melville Goodwin had been an officer who deserved every cent of money that the taxpayers had paid out on him.

"You know," and the voice of Muriel Goodwin took over again, like that of a lecturer in a darkened room, "Melville is difficult sometimes. I've sometimes thought he never wanted rank. I don't mean that he's afraid of it, but he's like an absent-minded professor sometimes. Of course we both knew that Melville would be a general one day, when his orders came for the War College, but all Melville really cares about is the practical side of war. I've often thought he'd rather be a colonel, because he would be nearer to the front. Well . . . now he's a general, and I'm very proud. He can't help being a general now . . . and perhaps I've done all I can for him, but I can't bear to think of his not keeping on and being a lieutenant gen-uld hear my sincerest radio voice, but the ds were not like mine.

Next I was on the plane again with all se VIP's and Dottie Peale. Then we were Paris. I was trying to explain Dottie Peale in, as I had often endeavored to explain to Helen. Dottie always knew how to ke men comfortable in the same degree t she made women uncomfortable. There wistful appeal to her restiveness and her content, especially in the neighborhood of ar, where no one could be content. It was inevitable that Melville Goodwin should have been attracted by her. Plenty of other people had sought for a love object in a war zone.

I was doing my best for Melville Goodwin, but neither Helen nor Muriel Goodwin showed sympathy or enthusiasm. Dottie would never have given him further thought if it had not been for that incident with the Russian soldier in Berlin. Muriel Goodwin frowned, but she picked up her work again, which gave me a note of hope.

"I thought everything would be the way it always was, when I saw him at the airport," she said.

"It would have been," I told her, "if she hadn't called him up. You can't blame it all on him. She's a very persistent girl."

SHE was rolling up the washcloth, and I braced myself. She put it in her bag and jerked the mouth of the bag together.

"I know," she said quietly. "Well, that's all there is, isn't it? . . . Helen, I wonder if you have a sleeping pill? I hate small women who think they're perfect, but it's a little hard to take, after all this time. I don't want to be alone with this all night."

I wished I were back in the ETO again, in a world without women, and I wished that Melville Goodwin had died, as he very well might have and should have, in North Africa or Salerno or somewhere along the Rhine.

"You may have a right to be hard on him," I said, "but I don't think he meant this to go so far. He only went overboard after he was assigned to Plans. He wanted to get away from the whole thing."

"Of course I knew he wouldn't like Plans," she went on. "He never knows what's good for him."

"He thinks you had something to do with it," I said.

That technical reference to the Army had disturbed her more than anything else I had said.

"Of course I had something to do with it," she said. "I've always had to do that sort of thinking for him. He has to be in Plans."

I had never felt so deeply sympathetic for Melville Goodwin, and suddenly I shared some of his exasperation. If I had not, I would never have spoken so bluntly.

"Well," I said, "men like to lead lives of their own sometimes, or they like to be allowed to think they do. And, besides, there's something you ought to know, Muriel. Whenever Dottie gets something, she wants something else. She and Mel haven't much in common, you know, and I've an idea she's tired of him already."

I felt in my pockets for a pack of cigarettes, but I could not find one, so I got up and walked across the room looking for one.

"In fact, she's told me so," I added.

Dottie Peale was a very clever girl. She could usually get her way in anything. I had given her message to Muriel.

Muriel Goodwin said, "So she doesn't want him. Why shouldn't she?"

All at once I thought of the time when she had handed Melville Goodwin the bayonet at the fairgrounds.

"That's almost too much, isn't it? That really makes me angry."

She reached in her work bag and pulled out the washcloth. "I know sometimes Mel is—well, heavy, and sometimes he's terribly intense, and if you hear his stories again and again . . . but she can't have heard them so often. Poor Mel, he's always a problem whenever he's on a staff." Muriel Goodwin dropped her crocheting. "What time is it?"

It was after eleven o'clock. We had been working for quite a while on Melville Goodwin.

Cloud O'Pumpkin!

NEW—AND HEAVENLY PIE WITH BAKER'S COCONUT

It's pumpkin time again—but pumpkin pie was never like this before.

For here's a pie airy-light as a cloud—with a new kind of taste excitement! Luscious, fluffy pumpkin and spice, laced through and through and topped with toasted, golden-brown Baker's Coconut! Good? It's sheer heaven!

Use snowy white Baker's Coconut to glamourize thrifty cakes, puddings, fruits. Buy coconut goodies, too—in food shops and bakeries!

COCONUT PUMPKIN CHIFFON PIE

1 envelope unflavored gelatine
¼ cup cold water
1¼ cups mashed cooked pumpkin
¾ cup evaporated milk
½ cup water
2 egg yolks, slightly beaten
¾ cup brown sugar, firmly packed
½ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon ginger
½ teaspoon nutmeg
½ teaspoon cinnamon
2 egg whites
½ teaspoon vanilla
1 cup Baker's Shredded Coconut, toasted*
1 baked 9-inch pie shell
⅓ cup cream, whipped and sweetened

Soften gelatine in ¼ cup cold water. Combine pumpkin, milk, ½ cup water, egg yolks, ½ cup of the sugar, salt, and spices in top of double boiler. Cook over boiling water 10 minutes, stirring constantly. Add gelatine and stir until dissolved. Remove from boiling water. Chill until slightly thickened.

Beat egg whites until foamy. Add remaining sugar gradually and continue beating until stiff. Fold in pumpkin mixture, vanilla, and ¾ of the toasted coconut. Turn into cold pie shell. Chill until firm. Before serving, top with whipped cream and remaining toasted coconut.

*To toast coconut, spread thinly in shallow pan. Place in moderate oven (350° F.) and toast about 10 minutes, or until delicately browned. Stir occasionally to toast evenly.

COPYRIGHT 1951, THE PULLMAN COMPANY

"If I could use the telephone," she said, "I'd better call up Washington. Ellen Grimshaw might be up, and I can fly down in the morning."

I went with her to the library to turn on the lights.

"I want to speak to Washington, D. C.," she was saying when I left her. "The number is Decatur ——" and then she was spelling it, "D-e-c-a-t-u-r ——"

Helen was standing by the dying embers of the fireplace. Her dark hair, her profile and her velvet housecoat gave her the sentimental look of a Burne-Jones or a Rossetti, and I was sure that her whole pose was planned.

"Helen," I said, "please don't start striking attitudes."

"Sidney," Helen said, "why did you say that in front of her?"

"Say what in front of her?" I asked.

"About your wanting to lead your own life sometimes—right in front of her," Helen said.

"I said men like to be allowed to think they do," I told her, "and you allow me to think I do usually. You even make me want to do what you want, usually."

"You didn't say that last part," Helen said. "Sidney, if you want, we can move. You know I'm always willing to do anything you want."

"You know I don't want to move," I said.

At least the air was clearer, and she did not look so aggressively like a Rossetti.

"Let's get this straight," I said. "You're not Mrs. Goodwin and I'm not Melville Goodwin."

We stood there waiting. Whether we wanted or not, we were in that constrained position of a host and hostess waiting for a guest to finish her call.

"Sidney," Helen said, "she's been trying so hard. Do you think she cares about him?"

"Yes," I said. "she cares for what he is."

"You know that isn't what I mean," she said. "If you really love someone, it doesn't matter what he is."

"Of course she loves him," I said, "but love isn't a constant quality. It has its ups and downs like anything else, and it varies all the time."

Helen shook her head. "It doesn't with a woman," she answered. "It never does."

"Well, it does with a man," I said.

"Well, I love you," Helen said, "and I don't care what you are."

I cared very much, but no one else should have heard us discuss it, especially Muriel Goodwin, and there she was, in the doorway, and I could not tell how long she had been standing there or how much she might have heard—but I knew as soon as she spoke.

"Yes," she said. "Yes, of course I love him, and it is something that doesn't change, even if you think it does."

SHE was in her best reviewing-stand attitude. I remember her blue-gray hair and her black broadcloth suit and even her plump stocky figure, but again I was not conscious of age. There was absolutely nothing to say.

"I wish it weren't so late," she said. Her voice was perfectly steady, but her shoulders began to shake. "I ought to be back in Washington. Please don't say that I don't love him," and then she sobbed, "She must be a damn fool."

It was no place for a man. Muriel Goodwin must have hated to have me see her with all defenses down, and she pulled herself together.

"Sidney," she said, "will you give me my bag, please? It's where I left it on the sofa."

Muriel Goodwin was looking for a handkerchief, of course, but instead she found the washcloth.

"I never thought I'd cry into this," she said. "I'm sorry. I always hate crying women. Good night, Sidney."

"Good night," I answered. "If you need anything, ask Helen, won't you?"

But she did not need anything any longer. She was the General's wife again and I was the young officer on the post.

"Of course Mel will have to be sent somewhere," she said. "I'm glad I reached Ellen Grimshaw. Mel mustn't ever know. You understand that, don't you?"

"Yes," I said.

"And, Sidney."

"Yes?" I said.

"Will you call about a plane reservation, please, and it would be nice if I had an alarm clock."

When Muriel Goodwin left at six-thirty the next morning, after kissing Helen she kissed me also, hastily but efficiently. It was a gesture of affection, but she was also obeying a warmhearted convention of service life. She was indicating that I was in the circle of the close friends of the General. She would have kissed Goochy in an identical manner if he were leaving for parts unknown.

I had asked, I remember, whether she did not want me to go with her and see her aboard her plane, but she would not hear of this. It would have made her, she said, feel too much like a dear old lady, and Helen and I had done so much for her already.

We were standing by the open door watching Henry drive away, and Helen was waving. It was bitter cold and raw at half past six in the morning, and I remember saying to Helen that I was out of the Army now, and I remember her answer—that it was just about time.

Unusual Love Poem

By Elizabeth McFarland

My burr-headed honey,
My dandy, my ditty,
Some say you are lordly
But I know you're pretty
In ways that a man
Best expresses himself—
You're a sociable tiger,
A reticent elf.

Your strength is the strength
Of all dream-wished-for things,
Like the power that pulses
In the deepest of springs;
For you sprang from the bush
Of my childhood's lost boys,
And I love you like children
With arms full of toys.

I had thought seriously that my friendship with Melville Goodwin was buried deep in a never-never land, but I heard from him exactly six days later. Somehow it seemed like a space of years.

It was just ten minutes before I was to go on the air when Miss Jocelyn, my new girl, told me that a General Melville A. Goodwin was on the telephone. She knew it was important because he had the private number.

"Tell him to call at seven-twenty," I told her.

Miss Jocelyn said she had suggested this already, but she had been told that it was a matter of extreme urgency. That was what he had said—extreme urgency.

I felt resentful, I remember, not only toward him but toward the whole system he represented. I thought of the time that Goochy had barged in unannounced with that summons to Washington, and then there had been the original telephone call from the Pentagon—and it seemed years ago—about helping Colonel Flax with my old friend General Melville Goodwin—the call that had started everything.

War always gave those people too much power. The best of them developed a Messiah complex once they had the rank. Goodwin now had so little to do with anything around me that I even found it difficult to believe that I had seen him only a few days before at the airport in Washington. It was nine and a half minutes before I would go on the air, and even his voice seemed far away.

"Look here," he was saying, and he was angry, "I don't want any more of this runaround. I want to speak to Mr. Sidney Skelton."

"You're speaking to him," I answered, "but I've only got a minute, Mel."

"Well, well, Sidney," he said. "Say, Sidney, I'm right here at the Waldorf and I have a suite. The management gave it to me—no extra charge. Drop everything and come up here, will you, Sid? Rooms fifteen eighty-three and -four. It's important."

"I can't," I told him. "I'm going on the air in just eight minutes."

"Oh, so that's it," he said. "Can't you get someone else to say your piece?"

"No," I said, "of course I can't, Mel."

There was a brief incredulous pause.

"Well, how soon can you get up here?"

"Around half past seven," I said.

"Well, see you make it and don't keep me waiting," he said.

"Yes, sir," I said, and I accented the "sir" in a heavy way that was impertinent.

There was another pause that told me he had caught my meaning.

"Now, now," he said, "what's the matter, son? Are you mad at me about anything?"

"No, sir," I said, and I elaborated the last word again in my sincerest tone, and then he laughed.

"Well, make it nineteen-thirty," he said. "Are you happy, boy?"

"No," I said.

"Well, that's too bad," he said, "because I'm feeling mighty happy."

WHEN I entered his rooms he was standing in the center of a small impersonal sitting room and there was no sign of anything about him there except himself; no hat or coat or open suitcase, only Melville Goodwin. He was wearing one of his older uniforms and not the new one I had seen him in so often since he had returned from overseas. It might have been the same uniform that he had worn in Paris. Something had changed in his manner too. He looked careless and easy, almost as I remembered him at Saint-Lô.

"Well, hello, son," he said. "I'm glad to see you," and he did look glad. He gripped my hand hard and slapped me on the shoulder. "How's Helen and Camilla?"

"They're fine," I said, and then I found myself hesitating, because I did not know where to go from there. I did not know whether the ice was thin or thick. "How's Muriel?" I asked. Somehow I was impelled to ask it, and not a line of his smile changed.

"Muriel's fine," he said. "She's busy as a bird dog. By the way, she had a swell time up at your house. She really needed to get away for a while. Have you eaten yet?"

"I'm sorry," I began. "I had some food brought in at half past six."

"That's all right," he said, "I've eaten too. Call up Room Service, will you, for some ice and glasses? I've got some Scotch. This is a sort of celebration, son—partly. You telephone and I'll get the bottle."

I was alone in the sitting room while I was calling Room Service, and he seemed to have vanished so completely that I almost felt he had not been there at all until he came back and put a fifth of Scotch on the table.

"There," he said. "Say, Sid, it's funny, isn't it, how we've got to be friends—close friends, I mean? Just as soon as I checked in here, I began saying to myself, 'I've got to see Sid before I push off.' I'd have called you earlier today, but I've had a lot of things to clear up."

He sat down opposite me on the edge of an easy chair with his feet drawn under him in that habitual pose that made him always seem ready for anything.

"I didn't know you were pushing off, Mel," I said. "Where are you pushing to?"

His forehead wrinkled and he rubbed his hand over the back of his closely cropped head. "Why, son," he said, "haven't you heard the news?"

Of course I had not heard the news, but it was like Mel Goodwin and all the rest of them to think that everyone knew when orders had been cut, especially close friends. He had not heard the news, but I remember

Medal of Honor

Major General William F. Dean, of Berkeley, California—Medal of Honor. In the hard early days of the Korean War, when it was Red armor against American rifles, General Dean chose to fight in the most seriously threatened parts of the line with his men. At Taejon, just before his position was overrun, he was last seen hurling hand grenades defiantly at tanks.

General William Dean knew in his heart that it's every man's duty to defend America. You know it, too. The General's job was in Korea and he did it superbly well. Your defense job is here at home. And one of the best ways to do that job is to start right now buying your full share of United States Defense* Bonds. For remember, your Defense Bonds help keep America strong, just as soldiers like General Dean keep America safe. And only through America's strength can your nation . . . and your family . . . and you . . . have a life of security.

Defense is your job, too. For the sake of all our servicemen, for your own sake, help make this land so powerful that no American again may have to die in war. Buy United States Defense* Bonds now—for peace!

Remember when you buy bonds for national defense, you also build personal cash savings. Remember, too, if you don't save regularly, you generally don't save at all. Money you take home usually is spent. So sign up today in the Payroll Savings Plan where you work or the Bond-A-Month Plan where you bank. For your country's security, and your own, buy United States Defense Bonds now!

RECIPE

SWISS STEAK—Hunt Style

Mother, your family's gonna love you for fixing this mouth-watering dish!...

The tantalizing flavor accent comes from the spicy, all-tomato goodness of Hunt's Tomato Sauce. That's the cooking sauce that's kettle-simmered for richness.

So many folks prefer Hunt's Tomato Sauce that it's America's largest-selling brand! Do get some at your grocer's and try this delicious recipe...

1 medium-sized onion, sliced 3 tbsp. fat
3 tbsp. chopped green pepper

In a heavy skillet, cook onion and green pepper in the fat until tender. Then take:

1½ lbs. beef (round, chuck, rump)

Pound flour into the beef with the edge of a heavy plate. Brown meat on both sides in the fat. Then add:

1 can Hunt's Tomato Sauce 1 tsp. Worcestershire sauce
1 cup water 1½ tsp. salt ¼ tsp. pepper

Cover and simmer 1½ hours or till tender. Then!...

Serve 4 people delicious helpings of Swiss Steak that'll do you proud! It's perfect with nice fluffy rice.

Keep several cans of Hunt's on hand. For stews, soups, roasts, casseroles. Costs but a few cents a can.

For breakfast or dessert...

Muriel Goodwin's pronouncement—Melville would have to be sent somewhere.

"That's right," he said, "of course you haven't heard. Listen, boy, they've asked for me at SCAP, right from the horse's mouth in Tokyo, and I hardly know anyone in SCAP. I'm flying out in two days and it's going to be with troops and Goochy's coming over too. Frizell is coming back. You know who Frizell is, don't you?"

"No," I said, "I don't think so."

"Well, we'll skip it because it's confidential," the General said. "I'm taking over from Red Frizell. It's going to be the beginning of a build-up and it's going to be with troops. Maybe it's going to be a corps command. I'm as happy as a kid. Congratulate the old man, will you, Sidney? The only thing that gripes me is that you're not coming too."

We both stood up and we shook hands formally, the way one should. "Well," I said in my sincerest voice, "congratulations." I did not know what any of it meant, because I did not know about future plans in the Orient, but I was thinking of Muriel Goodwin.

"Boy," he said, "I'm still slap-happy. I still can't believe I'd get anything like this. The only thing we need now is a war out there, and things don't look so good in China, do they? I've got a hunch it might happen in Korea."

He was never as dumb as you thought he was going to be. He knew his terrain and he had the prescience. It was the first time I had ever heard a serious mention of Korea. He was lost in the glow of that unknown new assignment, and he had the shining morning face of Shakespeare's schoolboy.

He said, "I wish I could give you the whole blueprint. You ought to have seen Goochy when he got the word, and you ought to have seen Muriel. She's acting just the way she did when we started off for Bailey. It's a nice thing from Muriel's point of view. We're moving into Frizell's quarters. He has one of those houses in Tokyo with dwarf gardens and all the old servants in kimonos and all paid for by the Occupation. Muriel's really going to get something, and maybe it's about time."

"Yes, maybe it's about time that Muriel had something," I said.

It was a strange world, I was thinking, and it was moving so fast that it was impossible to keep up with it any longer—for me, but not for Melville Goodwin, who had the service right behind him and his own simple lexicon of belief. He was safe again, safer than I would ever be in this changing world. There had been a stormy moment of maladjustment, but it was gone. He was off again, behaving exactly as he should, able to shed experience, but still some thought made him stare solemnly at his glass.

"You know," he said, "it's queer how a thing like this clarifies your thinking and changes your point of view. I don't seem to be the same person I was before I got the word. I don't know what's been the matter with me lately." He looked at me with cold, deceptive innocence. "You follow what I mean, don't you?"

"Yes," I said carefully, "I guess I do, partly."

He could see things without intermediate shadows.

"All right," he said, "let's lay it on the line. I had never thought of myself as being humanly inexperienced, but I must have been. Let's lay it on the line. Maybe I don't understand about women, Sid. Take Dottie Peale. Maybe I ought to have run around some when I was younger. I don't know what I was thinking of. Isn't that the damnedest thing?"

Science, in its effort to learn the laws of nature, is in theological language seeking to understand the way in which God acts. Science is concerned with what happens, with the actions that occur, and with learning the laws governing these actions. But action implies an actor, and theology is concerned with the actor. Whether the actor is termed the universe, nature or God is largely a matter of choice of words.

—ARTHUR H. COMPTON:
A Modern Concept of God,
from "Man's Destiny in Eternity," by M. T. Garvin (The Beacon Press).

He waited expectantly, but I did not answer.

"You always knew I was being a damn fool, didn't you?"

"Well, I wouldn't put it quite that way," I said.

"Horsefeathers," he said. "I had never faced up to it, that's all—not that she isn't a nice girl. She's a very remarkable person."

"That's so," I answered, "she's remarkable."

"It's sort of awkward, isn't it," he said, "to go to someone and just say you've been a damn fool, but I like to think I tell the truth."

"You mean that you've seen Dottie?" I asked.

"You didn't think I'd write her a 'Dear John' letter, did you? Yes, I saw Dottie at five this afternoon. She was wonderful. I don't know how she ever managed it, but she made it seem all right. She never let me feel for a minute that I was ducking out. In fact, she made it all seem like something to be proud of. I'll never forget her, Sid."

For some reason or other, nothing in that confession sounded tawdry or shopworn, when every element in it should have. Something in Melville Goodwin prevented it. There was always a quality in him of simple fact that raised him above the obvious. There was a metal in him that life had never tarnished, though it possessed a confusing luster for people like Dottie Peale and me. He was a stranger from a strange world which we could never touch.

"Of course," he went on, "I went through this with Muriel last night. I had to tell her I'd basically been a fool, and she was wonderful. She said it was only decent to clear it as quickly as possible with Dottie. She even helped me plan what to say."

He was watching me, and he must have read something in my expression.

"You would have done that, wouldn't you?" he asked. "If you had been in my shoes?"

"No," I said, "I don't think so. I don't believe I'd have had the guts."

He shook his head slowly. "That isn't guts," he said. "It's only truth. There are some things you have to lay on the line, some things. There's the flag, for instance."

"What?" I said. It was incredible. I could not see how Old Glory had entered into it, but then he was always an Old Glory Boy.

"There's the flag," he said again, "and there's taking care of the men and never telling them to do anything that you won't do yourself. That has nothing to do with guts." His eyes narrowed slightly. "You think I'm a pretty simple guy, don't you?" he asked.

"No, sir," I said. "I wouldn't call you simple."

"Well, it doesn't make a bit of difference," he said. "I don't know how it is, but I feel like a good boy who has done the right thing. Say, Sid, do you know what I'd like to do tonight? How about our staying here and polishing off some of this liquor in a serious way?"

It was a curious sort of ending and yet somehow it seemed appropriate. It meant that he was human after all, and it was a way of bridging a gap that divided us.

"Just because we've seen a hell of a lot together," he said, "just because—oh, hell, there isn't any reason."

"Well, I don't mind," I said.

"Boy," he said. "I knew you'd be right with me."

When he smiled, he looked like young Mel Goodwin from the Point.

"There used to be a bugler at Bailey," Melville Goodwin was saying. "His last name was Lowther—funny that this should come back to me now. He was always getting into trouble, but he could really blow the calls. Even when he was in the pen, the Old Man used to order him out under guard to play taps. When you heard that man do taps, it would hit you in the heels. It always eased you down and made everything clear—all the answers in the book.

"I remember what the Old Man said one night when taps was over. That was old Jupiter Jones. He was sitting on his veranda when Lowther marched by on his way back to the pen—the guard behind him, bayonet and everything. The Old Man had a real sense of humor.

"'Lieutenant,' he said to me, 'go down, will you, and see that that goldbricking bugler is locked in tight. I want him where you can get at him so he can blow taps over me when I die.'

"It's funny I should remember a thing like that, but you really should have heard him. It really was the answer. I sort of wish we had that goldbricking bugler here now."

"WE LIVE BY THE JOURNAL"

Jane Sanders Hill began to read the JOURNAL as a teen-ager on Philadelphia's Main Line. Both her parents, born in England, live in the same house in Rosemont, Pennsylvania, where Jane was raised.

"Jane was always a very gay person, very dramatic, with hoards of beaux, but she was also extremely domestic," says her quiet-spoken English mother. "From the time she was a tot of four she was always at my elbow when I was in the kitchen or at the sewing machine."

Although Jane never had as much money as her friends for clothes she was always well dressed.

"I can remember once when Jane was determined to have a new coat for Easter Sunday," chuckles her father. "There wasn't any money for one, so she went up to the attic and rummaged around until she found some old material ——"

"Beautiful black silk faille, from England," supplies Mrs. Sanders.

"She started cutting it out on the living-room floor at midnight, after a date," her father goes on. "Well, she finished it at four A.M. and wore it at the Easter parade at Atlantic City."

"When Ray's parents first met me, I'm sure they thought I was just a dizzy party girl," giggles Jane. "They didn't know then that I was a scholarship student at Immaculata College and a home-ec major, working holidays and Saturdays at Blum's department store in Philadelphia for my spending money."

Ray Hill, whose father is advertising director for the National Paint and Varnish Co., graduated from Valley Forge Military Academy and was studying chemical engineering at Villanova College when he met Jane on a blind date.

Ray, who weighs over 200 pounds and stands 6'4"—"A big healthy brute," Jane calls him proudly—explains, "I always liked intellectual girls. I was a moody kind of person; when I pulled a tendon playing football and was laid up for fifteen months, I had to change overnight from a guy who loved basketball and football and baseball to an invalid in bed with a book. Jane changed all my ideas about women; since marrying her, my bad moods have completely disappeared."

The twenty-one-year-olds were married ten months after they met, in a hurry-up ceremony, since Ray was about to be drafted. They started married life in one furnished room. "Married life is like junket. It needs to be left alone to set," believes Jane. Ray worked for a few weeks repairing refrigerators before the Army beckoned, and Jane sold stamps in a post office. Arithmetic has never been one of her strong points, and Ray, a wizard with figures, almost went crazy straightening out her accounts. "Some nights she'd come home from work as much as twenty dollars short, which we would have to make up, of course. I think some short-change artist must have been working on her."

When Ray went off to basic training, Jane was pregnant and so moved in with her family. The Hills' first daughter, Candy, was christened Candacius by the priest. The long, very difficult delivery in no way affected Jane's hopes for a large family—at least six children. When Ray was sent to Texas after OCS, Jane and the baby could afford to go with him, but he was soon ordered to Germany with the occupation army.

Nine months later he was home for good. Jane and Ray still laugh over the item in a small local newspaper which announced, "Lt. Ray Hill has just returned from a year's overseas duty to greet his newborn son."

They had now been married three years and their life together as a family was finally beginning. Ray got an engineer's job with Congoleum-Nairn in Westminster, a sleepy little town of about 6000 persons in the hills of Maryland, halfway between Baltimore and Gettysburg, Pennsylvania.

Ray and Jane and the two babies at first lived in one room in an old farmhouse, along with a cocker-spaniel puppy. Jane did all the washing by hand, including the diapers, and when she found she was again pregnant new quarters became imperative. They rented a four-room apartment to make room for Deborah. Next they rented about one third of a fourteen-room house in the country, where they had to do the plumbing and decorating themselves. Jane found a picture of a coral-pink chest in the JOURNAL; she and Ray mixed paint for hours until they hit exactly the right shade. They put this color on the walls, wallpapered the ceilings with trailing ivy, and covered up a huge fireplace with black and white paint.

Jane loves color and horrified her friends by painting an antique table emerald green. She also fell for a chair in the JOURNAL and hunted for months for the gabardine suit material which now slip-covers their big living-room armchair. The Hills' furniture is a comfortable collection of family hand-me-downs. "We've been so busy collecting babies and equipment, we've never had the money for anything else."

EXCEPT cars. Ray is a perfect bug on automobiles and says he'd rather own an old steamer than eat. They now own a new Willys station wagon; it was preceded by at least six other cars, including an ancient Model T Ford which Jane refused to set foot in, and a 1927 Chrysler which could be started only by pushing it downhill.

The Hills also turned to the JOURNAL for the name of their fourth child, Bruce, born in October, 1949.

One night when he was about five months old, the Hills were giving a family birthday party for Ray's younger sister. Jane didn't feel at all well, and when she began to run a temperature the family shooed her off to bed. Young Bruce was also sick; the doctor had been there in the afternoon and left aureomycin for him. Jane pulled his crib next to her bed so she could watch him. At 10:30 she took his temperature and was horrified to discover it was 105°. The doctor was summoned. He told them it was pneumonia, that the antibiotic was not taking hold, and there was nothing medical science could do for him.

"It was such a quiet thing," recalls Jane. "Ray and I sat side by side, watching the baby's face. We had never seen anyone die before. The three children were sleeping. It was so quiet."

Nobody thought of going to bed that night. Candy woke up first the next morning and her parents told her the news. She was five and a half at the time. She broke into wild sobbing and then said through her tears, "You mustn't tell Terry and Debby. They're too little to understand."

THIS was too much for Jane, who broke down completely for the first time. In a little while, Debby got up with the bright cheerfulness of a two-year-old facing a new day. For a while she seemed not to miss the baby. Then she began searching for him; first in his room and then in all the other rooms. When they finally told her, she was extremely annoyed. "She felt cheated and irritable. God had taken away the most important thing in her life. It wasn't fair."

Jane had pneumonia herself, by this time, and was put to bed. Neither she nor the children went to the funeral. For a long time Debby kissed Brucie's picture every morning. Now the children often visit his grave. "I don't think they worry about it," says Jane. "They know he is with God."

Jane wanted another child desperately and soon conceived, but miscarried after six weeks. At this time Terry, who was three, was busting out all over—aggressive, disobedient, rude; Jane in her highly nervous state found him unbearable. Candy has always been a mature little person with an even, although independent, disposition; she gauges her parents' moods, and when they are upset carefully stays out of their way. Deborah is just as womanly and domestic as her mother. But Terry! Soon after Bruce died, Jane saw a poem by Robert P. Tristram Coffin in the JOURNAL which goes, in part, like this:

I think it is because boys can Never control the yeast of man
Working in them: they must rise
Like biscuits or like blueberry pies;
They cannot ever keep from showing
How fast and fiercely they are growing.

"The yeast of man!" exclaims Jane. "What a wonderful phrase!" The poem is still tucked into the corner of her dressing-table mirror and has made, she claims, a world of difference in her attitude toward her husky, square-shouldered, pistol-toting young cowboy.

Jane once wrote to the JOURNAL for help on what Ray considers their major problem—money—and received some budget advice which they keep trying to put into practice. Between Ray's salary at Congoleum-Nairn and his National Guard pay (he is captain of the local unit), the Hills' income is about $6600 a year. Ray is forever making out new budgets, and by his accounting they should save $30 a month. "I'm still looking for that thirty dollars; it simply disappears." The only method of saving they have discovered is to ignore cents when entering a check. For instance, if Ray writes a check for $5.35, he enters it on the stub as a round $6. Over a period of months last year, they found an unexpected balance of $80. "Can't remember what we did to celebrate," says Jane.

She still adores to cook and sew, and until she got a new sewing machine this year, made all the children's clothes and most of her own on an 1870 model. She cans between 300 and 400 jars of fruit and vegetables a year. She makes all her own pies, biscuits and cakes, as well as éclairs, cream puffs and French bread. She is not, however, a methodical housekeeper. "I used to be. Monday do this, Tuesday do that, and by Friday I was too cranky to live with. Now I don't bat an eyelash if company comes and there are pussycats of dust under the bed."

"Didn't you do the wash today?" Ray will storm, burrowing through his bureau drawers for a clean handkerchief. "I mended some sheets," Jane replies brightly and goes right on talking. She talks so much, constantly, from dawn to dusk, that she has real voice trouble. She used to lose her voice entirely, but chest-breathing exercises have helped this.

Talking is only one outlet for her tremendous energy; she will also dance all night if given the chance. She likes to wear evening dresses she has designed and made. Off-the-shoulder white jersey sets off her creamy skin and sleek blond hair; with big, black-haired Ray in dinner jacket they make a striking couple. Nowadays the Hills' social life centers mainly about the National Guard dances and parties, and they have recently joined the Westminster Riding Club, a social group which has nothing to do with horses.

The Hills see that their children have plenty of good times too. Birthdays are always productions, as Jane calls them. Christmastime they go overboard on making Hansel and Gretel castles coated with icing and peppermints and gumdrops, with everybody helping. Or Jane makes huge stuffed Raggedy Ann and Andy dolls which Ray swears proudly would cost $25 apiece in a specialty shop.

Jane phones Ray at the office at least once a day to keep him posted on everything he's missing at home, and the minute he's in the front door he gets a more complete recital. Perhaps that is why Jane so much enjoys Harlan Miller's page in the JOURNAL, especially the last paragraph where he often sums up some of the rewards of being a parent.

Jane has a list too. The time Terry dragged seventeen heavy screens down from the attic all by himself, two by two, hosed them off and lugged each to the proper window. The look on tomboy Candy's face the day she wore her new pink-and-blue organdy birthday dress and for once didn't climb a tree. The way Debby wraps her white kitten in a blanket and feeds it with a doll's bottle, "while mommy milks baby." Or the day Ray came home $125 poorer with a chiffon negligee for his favorite girl. And the fact that he still loves her although she never wears it.

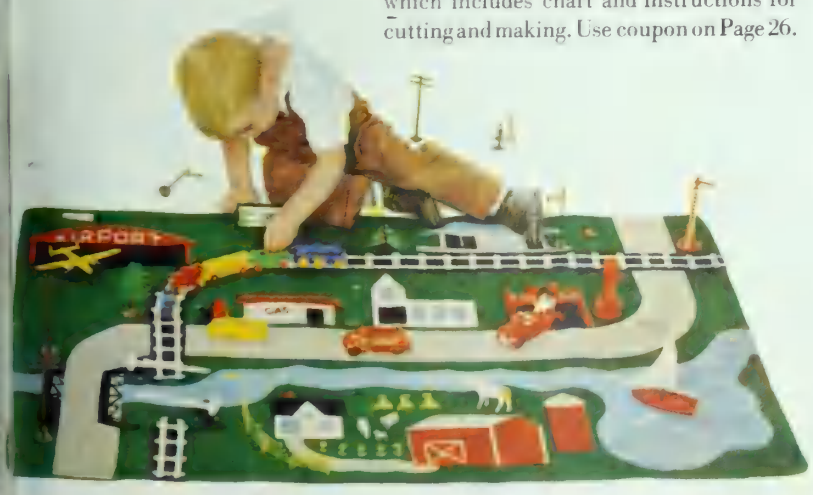
TANA HOBAN



This felt play rug of a small village inspires a stimulating game for youngsters from two to ten. It is a game that children can play together or by themselves.

JOURNAL PLAY RUG . . .

An Enchanting and Lasting Christmas Present

From the tender age of two, cars, airplanes, fire engines and boats are objects of curious, wondering eyes. The association of boats with water, planes with the sky, trains with tracks is just one of the wonderful discoveries of early childhood. The difference between a coal car and a steam shovel, a fire engine and a tractor, is quickly noticed, and their individual duties become part of a child's play. Our JOURNAL play rug has roads, railroad tracks, a river and lake, an airport and a gas station . . . all scaled for the small toys available in dime stores throughout the country. It is an object of constructive play . . . of everyday life. A youngster can live in this little town in his own imaginative way. He can get gas at the gas station, go to the lake to sail his boat, and to the station to catch a train. It's fun on rainy days, wonderful for a shut-in because it can be placed on a bed. Also it is decorative used as a wall decoration in a playroom. By NORA O'LEARY

This rug has been designed for easy sewing. It measures 36″ by 54″. It is a simple appliqué stitch of felt on felt. We have arranged for you to buy all the materials (two layers of green felt for rug and all necessary amounts of other colors used in the decorations) in a complete package for $8.95 from Fun-With-Felt, 215 Middle Neck Road, Great Neck, N. Y. Send for JOURNAL Pattern No. 2584, 25¢, which includes chart and instructions for cutting and making. Use coupon on Page 26.

scaled for dime-store toys, the rug can be equipped with everything from lamp-posts to animals on the farm. Boats, fire engines and planes also have their places.

motorboat on a calm sea. It is strange how with twelve dogs, no two voices are at all alike. Daphne, the wild Irish, sounds like a fire siren, Maeve speaks heavier and lower. The cows pay absolutely no attention to the tallyho. They move with their own dignity toward the red barn and their own dog, Shep, trots along with them.

On a cold November night, we like a dish such as Veal Chili. To make it, I soak 2 cups red kidney beans in 6 cups water overnight, drain, and place in a pan with 4 cups fresh water, 2 teaspoons salt, 1 teaspoon chili powder (or more if you love chili). Cover and bring to a boil and simmer 3 hours. Or if you use a pressure cooker, cook at 15 pounds for 20 minutes. Drain, cool, and store in the refrigerator until nearly time for dinner. Simmer 2 cups sliced onions and 1 clove garlic in 2 tablespoons fat in a large skillet. When they are tender, take them out and brown 1 pound ground veal in the same pan. Add the onion, garlic and 3 cups canned tomatoes, another teaspoon chili powder, 2 more teaspoons salt and the beans. Simmer, covered, for 20 minutes.

Optimism: A cheerful frame of mind that enables a teakettle to sing though in hot water up to its nose. —ANON.

Serve with a mixed salad bowl, crusty French bread and, for dessert, broiled grapefruit. I put the coffeepot on as we sit down, and there we are. Canned kidney beans will do very well for a quickie.

When someone drops in for tea, I like to make Alice Adams Teacake. For that I mix together ¾ cup sugar, ½ cup butter or margarine, 1½ cups flour, 1½ teaspoons baking powder, ½ teaspoon salt and 2 teaspoons cinnamon. I reserve ⅓ cup of this for topping and add ½ cup milk and 1 beaten egg to the rest, beat until smooth. I pour the batter in a greased 8" cake pan, sprinkle the topping on it and bake 20 minutes at 350°F., or until a straw comes out clean when inserted in the center. I serve it hot, with sweet butter or margarine for those who do not care about calories. If the children are here, I double it, because the wedges of that cake seem to vanish in an instant.

For Sunday-morning breakfast, I like to make Rosalie's Hot Cakes as a change from waffles. To make them, I beat 2 eggs well, add 2 cups milk, 2 tablespoons sugar and beat again. I sift together 2 cups flour, dash of salt and 1 tablespoon baking powder and add to eggs and milk; 1 tablespoon melted shortening and 1 teaspoon vanilla go in for a final beating. I bake in small cakes on hot griddle, turning once when the batt bubbles on the cakes. These are good for d sert, too, with jelly, jam or powdered sug

Whenever the days are fair, we eat lun in the Quiet Garden; often after the first sn it warms up enough for us to carry trays o and savor the tranquil light. The thyme b tween the flagstones has tightened itself a creeps close to the ground. It is such a sm thing to be so strong against winter. The i leaves have darkened; it is time to ta sprays in and establish them in the tall gre bottles.

Thanksgiving is gay with massed greens the big copper bowl, with the wooden bre trough filled with harvest fruits, and with t red corn hanging against the worn pi mantel. Apples and raisi and nuts go on the ben by the fire, the chee board is decked forth wi round little rosy Edam a pale Swiss and bright Che dar. The elegant ne crackers stay crisp for be time nibbling.

In the night an owl cri from the darkened woods, a cold and lone sound. It makes the firelight seem bright the house more snug and safe.

There is much to be thankful for at t Thanksgivingtime. For love, which everyo may have in the measure in which he hims metes it out to others. "The more I giv the more I have," says Juliet, and it is For friends—old friends who grow dear and new friends who are an adventure.

For stars and moon and the benison sunlight—and how we do love that in N England! For the seasons, each with its o mystery and loveliness.

For faith in God. What a great limitle blessing this is, and that in our country G is never denied us. The list lengthens until begin to feel like a fairy-tale queen.

And little Sister, hopping on my lap, a moving a flannel tongue over my hand, say "Thankful for me, too, aren't you?"

I assure her that every day is Thanksgivi when the house is demolished by a bevy cockers and a brace of Irish setters!

The still night deepens, the moon has s her sail. The stars have a quiet brilliance The air smells of frost, and the country fo are off for bed.

"Happy Thanksgiving," I say to t world as I close the door. "Happy Thank giving to everyone."

drop-leaf table, perhaps a rocking chair, and lots of paint and fabric.

"Sunshine yellow and Persian blue is to be the scheme," she announced, as if the matter had long been decided. "The JOURNAL once used that combination for one of my favorite rooms and now I am going to try it out."

We agreed that yellow is a perfect choice for old rooms. It makes sunny the dark corners, is kind to imperfections in old finishes and combines well with other colors.

Mrs. Hill chose the yellow-and-blue garden-flower print for her draperies and slip covers, not only because of its style and dash but for its compatibility with her home-painted furniture. Any gay washable cotton, however, is suitable for use in a family room of this type.

She gave early consideration to space for bookshelves. These were homemade and fitted as a unit between the front windows.

A charming and comfortable sofa was constructed out of a secondhand spool bed—not an old one. The sofa was made to fit a single-bed mattress already on hand. To get the extra length, the headboard was sawed in two, and into it was set the middle section of the footboard. The remaining ends of the footboard made the curved arms.

Both the lamp table and the coffee tab used old legs with new tops, an accommod tion which allows today's convenient pr portions to combine with yesterday's charm You can buy all kinds of turned legs, old new style, at your lumber dealer's and appl whatever tops you like to them.

Mrs. Hill selected ideas from sever JOURNAL decoration pages to use in her livi room, keeping an eye out for features s liked and those that would combine happil in a family room. Serviceable braided ru and sheer washable curtains are both ine pensive; home-style upholstery and sli covers, together with pickup furniture, kee the budget low. The spool bed cost only $1 when new, and club chairs of the type use secondhand or at auction, cost $10 to $20. selecting secondhand chairs, by the way, loo for sound structure and conservative sty and proportions. Worn upholstery doesn matter, since you will be covering them an way, and a good shampooing will make the fresh underneath.

Add to such furnishings your own waln chest or drop-leaf table, together with a fe of your prized accessories, and the room your dreams becomes a reality at reasonab cost. THE EN

Skulda Banér

Our eyes were opened, as yours may be, by this note from SKULDA BANÉR, who wrote Urda Has a Silver Dollar (Page 42): "The last peek I had at the world was in November, 1940, just before an operation on my eyes for glaucoma. A heck of a thing, learning to walk, to read, to write again—middle-aged! But the typewriter was an old friend—there are Braille and the tape recorder, and Seeing-Eye Blackie. With their help, I am getting many incidents of my Swedish-American childhood down on paper. My mind's eye sees well."

Betty Kjelgaard

BETTY KJELGAARD, who wrote The Careful Hearts (Page 58), says her best ideas come from her parents and numerous brothers, whose zest for living sometimes gives her some good plots. When she sells a story borrowed from their personal activities, however, they expect a reward. She thinks they should reward her. The Kjelgaards live in a small town (name is a secret) along the Sullivan Trail on the Susquehanna River—"It's everybody's home town and a good spot for a writer."

Miracle of Snowflakes

Naperville, Illinois

Dear Editors: Ever since I woke up this morning it has been snowing lightly—large light flakes that float to the ground in slanting zigzag lines. This commonplace miracle of a snowflake shouldn't fall unnoticed by those who need everything they can find, even such a tiny miracle as a snowflake, to remind them that life has design and purpose. As unnoticed as "just another snowflake," a Child was born a long time ago. Who cared and who noticed, except unimportant shepherds and few others? We know now that God was speaking through the miracle of the birth of Jesus. Through Him yet He speaks to us. A hearing heart will know this Christmas season that God lays His claim upon us as quietly and softly as a snowflake falls. But it is there, it is there! Sincerely yours,

HARRY B. GORDON

When Women Vote

Spokane, Washington

Dear Editors: The country has a great need for political consciousness among its wives and mothers. It's not necessary to sally forth in a flower-encrusted hat and a formidable look or to outshout friend husband, but rather to be aware of the world about us—and see that each member of our family votes on every issue from school bonds to the presidency!

"Never Underestimate the Power of a Woman"—let alone millions of them! Watch the rising percentage of Americans using their right and duty to vote!

Sincerely,

MARY NEILSON

"Help Wanted" Got Help

Akron, Ohio

Dear Ruth: The fan mail on our How America Lives story has dropped off greatly, but I always seem to have a half-dozen letters waiting to be answered. I answer them in odd moments so that I still manage to keep up with my reading, knitting and other routine chores.

Andy has almost finished the paneling in the living room. He did it all himself. He took a week off in July and thought he had a carpenter lined up to help him, but the man never made it.

Winkie seems to be getting along fine in school so far. Frank is going to nursery school in the mornings and he seems to be enjoying it a lot. So that leaves only Larry here in the mornings and it's quite a relief. He's very good when he's alone and we get along fine.

Nearly bedtime and I must complete my weekly grocery list. Larry is my little helper now—we shop while Winkie and Frank are at school.

I can't offhand think of anything much to add—except that the JOURNAL and the people who have written have really helped me to gain a new perspective and an optimistic outlook. Sincerely,

ALGY PETERSON

It's the Worst!

Johnson City, Tennessee

Dear Editors: In the September issue of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL is one of the lowest-type stories I have ever read in And Have Not Charity, by Mary E. Vroman. I have always liked the JOURNAL very much, but this is the worst thing I have ever seen in a supposedly nice magazine.

Very sincerely,

No Troubles, No Fun!

Toronto, Canada

Dear Editors: I notice you question why people like to read about families who have troubles—is it because we love soap operas? No, it isn't that; it is because all of us have trouble sometime and it gives us a lift to read about others' having troubles and surmounting them. It gives us hope.

Do you really like people who have no problems and nothing wrong with them? To me, they seem inhuman and, moreover, they give me a feeling of inferiority and failure which I do not enjoy. They don't hold any interest for me. They are like creatures from another planet—I can't imagine them. I still like the Horatio Alger motif, while Elsie Dinsmore leaves me cold. Yours sincerely,

EMMA D. SCOTT

More People Vote Now

Pittsburg, Kansas

Dear Ladies' Home Journal: Lucy Madeira Wing has my hearty good wishes in her efforts to urge people to use their blessed privilege at the ballot box—but that expression, "80 per cent of the voters went to the polls (1800)," should be explained, and not left as a comparison to the present 51 per cent.

The persons who were permitted to vote in 1800 were few and far between. No women, no Negroes, no one who did not have land or money. Many other restrictions limited the number who could vote. Some historians say that less than 2 per cent of adult males could vote in some areas; the cheeriest of them put it at 15 per cent. The last decade of American voting has seen the highest percentage of qualified voters casting the ballot. Our suffrage is improving, not deteriorating! Sincerely,

LENA MARTIN SMITH

Are Ministers Worth More?

Detroit, Michigan

Dear Editors: During twenty years in the ministry we have lived in rectories and therefore own no property except our five-year-old car and an odd assortment of furniture. Our income is now $4000 a year. With the utmost frugality, our checking account goes from something to zero before payday arrives.

We have five children. My husband is a handsome big fellow of forty-six, determined, conscientious and an excellent preacher. He never has an eight-hour day or less than a seven-day week.

It seems to me there is something odd about a society in which a clergyman and his family are supposed to have a well-kept, well-furnished, neat home on a salary not one member of the parish could budget. Long ago doctors felt they had to live that way and say nothing, but they have discovered that they can ask proper fees and still serve humanity.

The whole thing amounts to a sense of values. For example, one may have an elaborate wedding in which hundreds of dollars go to the florist, hundreds more to the country club, hundreds more to the hotel for the reception, but the clergyman receives $10, and at times nothing.

Our children ask, "Why did daddy go into the ministry? If he were still an engineer we would have a nice house." Well, I am ever so thankful my husband went into the ministry. The work itself is gratifying and close to the hearts of people. I am proud of my husband and our children and I love our church. But it seems to me we should be able to live nicely, as do our friends who are doctors and lawyers, and have the public esteem and the financial return that hard work deserves. Yours,

Who is Glamorous?

Toronto, Canada

Dear Editors: There is no law that requires any girl to be a homemaker, and no girl has more freedom than the American girl to choose whether she will be a private secretary, a doctor, a radiologist, a dress designer—or a homemaker. Surely if she chooses to make a home, she is no more "stuck with pots and pans" than a scientist is stuck with smelly test tubes. As my twenty-year-old daughter just remarked, "In a nutshell—we're built to have babies and babies wear diapers!" Sincerely,

Boys Have Responsibility

Richmond, California

Dear Editors: I believe that moral laxity among our young people could be greatly decreased if boys accepted as much responsibility for moral conduct as girls are expected to. Too much blame is placed on girls. Controlling youthful emotions is not as easy for them as a great number of people want to believe. Fathers worry quite a bit over their daughters and do a great amount of preaching to them. When it comes to their sons, it's a different story. I have even heard some boast of their sons' "conquests." Yours truly,

Lexington, Kentucky

Dear Editors: For the past year I have sent my four-year-old upstairs to her room when she was weepy, cross or rough with the baby, but never with the idea of punishment. Always we have stressed that she must be tired of being with people and had better stay alone until she could be happy in company. On one such occasion last year, she came down from her room, picked up her doll and started back, explaining that she wasn't happy yet but would be down again when she was.

Yours very truly,

COLORFUL posters covered the walls of a tiny Chicago meeting hall crowded with two hundred women. Some young, some not-so-young, the brave and timid, the prim and bold, hussies in silk and heroines in calico. All eager to become the brides of California ranchers —men they have never seen, in a country they had heard about only vaguely, to be reached by a journey whose hardships they could not even guess.

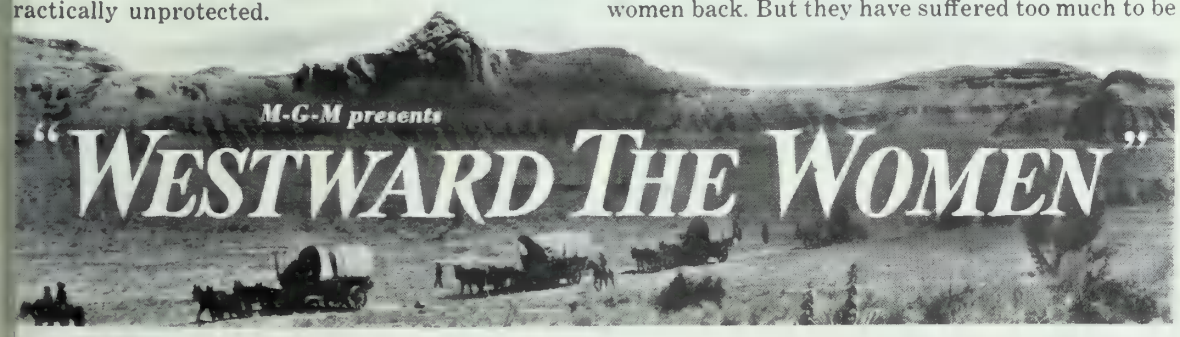
On the platform is a collection of daguerreotypes, pictures of the homesteaders in Whitman's Valley. Flushed and eager, the women pore over the pictures. Each selects the man she hopes to marry, the stranger with whom she will begin life anew at the end of the journey.

All except one, the French girl Danon. She has her eyes and heart set on Buck Wyatt, the guide who will lead the expedition. But the cynical Wyatt's only interest in his petticoat cargo is the large fee he will receive upon its safe delivery.

The wagon train finally starts westward, with a crew of outriders who are under strict orders to leave the women alone. After weeks of traveling across the deepening wilderness, human nature asserts itself and most of the outriders desert with the women of their choice, leaving the caravan practically unprotected.

There seems to be no recourse but to turn back. But the women, however defenseless, are undaunted. They doggedly set about learning to cut trail, handle stock, ride and shoot. And once again the train stretches out. Through flash storms, mire, raging river crossings, canyons so steep that it seems nothing can prevent wagons, mules and women from careening to doom. And then, out of nowhere, the terror of an Indian attack! With rifles blazing, and despite terrible casualties, the women successfully resist the ravages of the redmen.

Taking stock of his depleted forces, Wyatt is sick with pity and remorse. He offers to lead the women back. But they have suffered too much to be cheated of their goal, even though Death Valley lies before them.



As they string out in the moonlight over the crusted salt flats, Wyatt walks beside Danon, aware of her as a woman for the first time, choosing her from all the others to love.

At last the travel-stained caravan approaches journey's end. Whitman's Valley is over the next hill. At this juncture the women refuse to go further until Wyatt rides into town and returns with finery and frills. For, although they had overcome challenges that would daunt the strongest men, they are women at heart and must meet their future husbands looking their best!

It makes for a finish that is bravely comical and pretty wonderful.

In "Westward the Women" M-G-M has brought to the screen one of the great adventures of America's pioneering days. And it is all the more thrilling for its authenticity, having actually been filmed on the California overland trail of '49.

CHRISTMAS IS FOR ADULTS

By G. M. White

CHRISTMAS comes a piece at a time at our house. Weeks before, we inspect the Christmas decorations to make sure they are in order. They never are. A box or two always spills. Shimmering bits of fire-blue baubles and last year's pine needles scatter on the rug. The pine smell starts.

My wife says that of all the things that Christmas means, of these we can be sure: too much to eat and a lot of extra work. But her eyes are dreamy when she says it. When our Christmas preparations get slightly hectic we tell each other, "We must do it for the children." How we lie!

Christmas is for adults. Christmas is not for kids with eyes always like stars. Most of us would like to reclaim some of the innocence of childhood, if only for a little while, but we are afraid to go about it directly. Christmas is the excuse we use to peek between our fingers at something greater than ourselves. Christmas is for adults, who need it most.

The need began long before primitive men thumped on taut skins and implored indifferent spirits to make them strong and keep them safe. When the threat of ice is in the air, you can notice it slightly now: a compulsion to be loved and under the protection of a benevolent god. When there is a chilly edge to twilight you walk home with brisker steps. Get home where one is not so small or so alone, where there are warmth and food and the mingled odor of aniseed and hot orange peel like fresh wild roses!

On Christmas Day at our house we shall pretend our gifts have made the children happy, but their happiness is the priceless gift to us. In the boys' squeals of delight we hear the angel say: Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy. Our wise men, peering into the swirling mists of atom and universe, have found no better gift than the will to love God—and to love thy neighbor as thyself.

Religion In American Life

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

AMONG thoughtful people of various creeds, and even of no creed, one can discern a growing consciousness and conviction that the world crisis is, fundamentally, neither economic nor military, but moral, ethical and religious.

It is, I think, an error to attribute this crisis to "communism," or to believe that it has suddenly broken out as the result—for instance—of two world wars. That is putting the cart before the horse.

Communism was born in the middle of the nineteenth century, a very great century in many ways. Pre-eminently it ushered in the industrial age, and the age of science, and rapidly advanced the belief in a materialistic and mechanistic universe and philosophy of life. Karl Marx was by no means out of tune with this age. Although he was a revolutionary radical, the basic assumptions of his work were the basic assumptions of his times, as they are still to a very great degree the basic assumptions of our own.

The belief that man is an economic animal, and that his life and culture are determined by the institutions of material production, was accepted by Marx's opponents as well as by his partisans. That the good life was the rich life—rich in material things—was the logical continuance of that line of thinking. It was also, then, logical to assume that if the ownership and control of the means of production could, by being divorced from the profit motive, assure abundance for all, all the evils in the world—both good and evil being economically inspired—would fade away, and man would return, as it were, to a kind of idyllic condition, to a greatly improved Garden of Eden.

Marx, like many idealistic philosophers, reared an imposing logical structure on an assumption. For years it was the logical structure that was attacked by his opponents. It is only now, after actual test of his theories, that it is becoming daily more apparent that the fault lies in the assumption, not in the logic built upon it.

Man is, among other things, an "economic animal." But it is only at the most (Continued on Page 14)

1 DeLuxe FRUIT CAKE

USE ONLY GOLD MEDAL FLOUR

Moist, delicious fruit cake as generous with good things as the holiday season itself! Extra rich with spices, figs, nuts and candied fruits. May be cut in thirds and wrapped as separate gifts.

Mix together . . . . . 1 cup Wesson Oil, 1½ cups brown sugar (packed in cup), 4 eggs

Beat vigorously with spoon or electric mixer for 2 minutes.

Sift together . . . . . 2 cups sifted GOLD MEDAL Flour, *1 tsp. double-action baking powder, *2 tsp. salt, 2 tsp. cinnamon, 2 tsp. allspice, 1 tsp. cloves

Stir into Wesson Oil mixture alternately with . . . . . 1 cup fruit juice (pineapple or orange for light cake)

Mix . . . . . 1 cup more sifted GOLD MEDAL Flour into . . . . . 1 cup shaved citron, 1 cup chopped candied pineapple, 1½ cups whole candied cherries, 1 cup raisins, 1 cup chopped figs, 3 cups coarsely chopped nuts

Pour batter over fruit, mixing thoroughly.

Line with brown paper 2 loaf pans, 8½ x 4½ x 2½-in. Pour the batter into the pans. Place a pan of water on the lower oven rack. Bake cakes 2½ to 3 hours in slow oven (275°). After baking, let cakes stand 15 minutes before removing from pans. Cool thoroughly on racks without removing paper. Cover and store to ripen. If cakes are to be kept for a long time, remove paper and wrap in fruit juice soaked cloths. Store in a cool, dry place.

If you use Gold Medal Self-Rising Flour (sold in parts of the South) omit baking powder and salt.*

primitive level of existence that he is wholly, or even primarily, purely "economic." A man in cruel imprisonment, kept on rations approaching the starvation level, thinks only of food. But human beings, even at the instinctive level, with a modicum of their digestive needs fulfilled, and with fairly adequate protection against the elements, in the form of clothing and shelter, have at least two other basic urges: the urge to be recognized as unique and apart, which is the ego; and the sexual urge.

These urges are not, in themselves, either good or evil. The economic urge—the will to prosper materially—is both the father of greed and the mother of invention and initiative. The ego can make a person into a glutton for power over his fellow men, or into their greatest benefactor. The sexual urge is both the parent of crime and the founder of the family; it can be sublimated at the highest level of love, into beneficence and art, and it can crop out in criminal insanity.

Human culture, as I see it, is created by the sublimation and canalization of these urges, which are parts of man's animal inheritance, into expressions compatible with his mental and spiritual growth, his personal happiness and joy, and his peaceable adjustment to the community.

All civilization rests upon the cultivation of inhibitions. So do all freedom and security. An uninhibited society is a savage society, a jungle, in which no one is either free or safe.

The function of law is to impose such inhibitions. The law is a series of Thou Shalt Nots, and the weapon it wields is fear of punishment. But law is, itself, only the codification of existing states of consciousness and conscience. If the conscience of a society does not support the law, the law will not function.

But whence comes conscience?

We live today in a society which has the highest standard of living, and the widest distribution of the fruits of production, ever enjoyed by any human society in the history of mankind. Yet it shows, at the same time, an appalling crime record, and at every social level. Those entrusted to enforce the law are found to be on the payrolls of the lawbreakers, and government proves itself adept at circumventing the spirit, if not the letter, of what it would impose on the society it governs. Mutual mistrust is widespread. Loyalty is in question. A cynical frame of mind prevails that "every man has his price," and that behind every word and act is a mercenary or power-seeking ambition. Parents struggle for any degree of authority over their children, and many even welcome the induction of their sons into the Army in the hope it will "teach them some discipline." We find out that thousands of teen-agers are dope addicts.

And throughout our society is an undertow of almost hysterical fear—fear of one's own state and of other states, of Russia and of communism, and, indeed, of life itself. "Emotional maladjustment" reveals itself as the most prevalent American disease, and while we make drives against cancer and infantile paralysis, the psychiatrists are flourishing.

A SOCIETY in such a condition is one showing symptoms of disintegration, a society out of focus, because it has no frames of reference, or basic loyalties to which the masses of its people give natural, unconscious allegiance.

In a sound society, loyalties are inherent. They cannot be established by loyalty oaths. Nor are they encompassed by loyalty to a government, or to a constitution. They are loyalties to a spirit which must constantly animate governments and constitutions if these are to retain their authority.

And authority can be exercised by a minimum of coercion only if it ratifies the moral authority already present in the mind and soul of a society—only if there is a strong and widespread conviction in the people themselves of what is right, good and permissible, and what is wrong, evil and intolerable.

Now, there is no historical example of any nation, tribe or society reaching and sustaining a high level of human culture or even long maintaining its cohesiveness without faith, belief in or acceptance of the probability (I am putting this as undogmatically as possible) that moral sanctions exist above the human, the visible, the material, the tangible. As far back as we have any records of man as man, we find him, and his societies, concerned with the conviction that spiritual forces mold human life and conduct. And as far back as we have any records, we find man as a being of thought and spirit concerned with the question, "Why are we here? What is the meaning of life and the purpose of existence?"

PEOPLE and societies who cannot see any purpose in their existence beyond the material and the tangible must live chartlessly, and must live in spiritual misery, because they cannot overcome the greatest fact and mystery of human life, next to birth, which is death.

The answers cannot be proved by science—although modern science has already blown up the nineteenth-century assumptions of a material and mechanistic universe. The answers must come out of the spiritual experiences of man through the ages, the experiences which have produced the great religions.

A secular and materialistic age has scoffed at such experiences as "superstitions" or even as symptoms of madness, as though Jesus, Amos or Francis of Assisi—or Gandhi—were less sane than, say, Harry S. Truman; or as though an experience of truth, born out of the most concentrated effort to shake off oneself and open every pore, every brain cell and nerve to messages from the unseen world, were not an experience. The attitude is not itself "scientific," for it rejects evidence merely because it cannot explain it. The knowledge of the prophets, the seers, is just as "real," as (though much rarer than) the knowledge that is won from the test tube or the telescope, though it is acquired through a different medium of insight.

Selfishness is that detestable vice which no one will forgive in others and no one is without himself.
—HENRY WARD BEECHER.

It is my conviction that this country can recover its poise and serenity only when it refinds its religious loyalties, whether these be centered in the Jewish prophets or the revelations of Christ, and these loyalties come to suffuse the whole of its civilization.

This requires, among other things, a fundamental re-examination of our education. It has been secularized to the point that our schools not only shut out all religious or spiritual influences, but increasingly encourage agnosticism and atheism. A concept of the separation of church and state has grown up which, if it goes on, will finally result in our withdrawal from Judaeo-Christian civilization altogether.

An education which does not admit even reference to religious experience and inspiration is a failure even of education in a quite narrow sense. No one can understand Western culture at all—the culture that is threatened as never in its millennial history—who does not understand its religious bases and the religious assumptions on which its very laws are based. No one who is not familiar with the major prophetic passages of the Bible can possibly read with comprehension much of the finest English literature, which is replete with Biblical allusions. How in the world can any child make head or tail out of Lincoln's great Second Inaugural Address who does not understand the quotations, uttered without "quotes," that come directly from

Under-Cover Stuff

TOY manufacturers have estimated that the child population (under fourteen) has gone up more than a million over last year. But it won't go up so fast if the new-type toys catch on too well. To keep up with world affairs—which they might much better forget while toymaking—they have now produced a semiscientific number called a "cloud chamber" which shows alpha particles moving at 12,500 miles a second. Also an "atomic rocket" that scurries across the floor. And a "zoomeray" gun. Don't ask us where to get them. We don't know. We're looking for fish ponds and bean bags and tiddlywinks.

When all the rest of us are celebrating Christmas on December 25th, the folks down in Rodanthe, North Carolina, will be waiting for Old Christmas, their Christmas, which falls on January 5th, the Eve of Epiphany. Then they will roast oysters and watch for the Wild Bull of the Hatteras to appear. Each year he emerges from the woods, paws the ground, and snorts at those who didn't quite measure up during the past year. Or that's what they claim in Rodanthe.

As too many people know, there is a town called Santa Claus (Santa Claus, Indiana, population 67), which does an enormous post-office business around Christmastime. Now we've heard of a town in Maryland from which singer Lily Pons used to mail her cards. It is Lilypons, Maryland.

Incidentally, it's a shame to throw away Christmas cards. They've become so attractive, and so many hundreds of institutions are eager to get them—

Did you ever see such tidy, generous cuts of five glorious fruits? How richly ripe they are, too!

...nderful how quick ...d easy it is, too! ...st spoon it out. ...u know Del Monte ...ways delivers flavor!

FRUIT COCKTAIL SPANISH CREAM

- 1 No. 2½ can DEL MONTE Fruit Cocktail
- 1½ tbsps. unflavored gelatin
- 3 eggs, separated
- ½ cup sugar
- 1½ cups milk
- 2 tsps. grated lemon peel
- 2 tbsps. lemon juice
- 1 tsp. vanilla
- Dash of salt
- Small jelly roll
- Whipped cream, if desired

Drain fruit cocktail, reserving syrup. Soften gelatin in ½ cup of the syrup. In top of double boiler, mix egg yolks and ¼ cup of the sugar. Stir in milk. Cook over hot water, stirring constantly, until mixture coats metal spoon. Remove from heat; stir in softened gelatin, lemon peel and juice, vanilla and 1 cup of the drained fruit. Chill till mixture begins to thicken. Make meringue of egg whites, salt and remaining ¼ cup of sugar. Fold into custard mixture. Slice jelly roll; place slices against sides of 2-qt. loaf pan. Turn pudding into pan. Chill till firm. Unmold; serve topped with remaining fruit cocktail, chilled, and garnish with whipped cream sweetened with some of the remaining fruit cocktail syrup, if desired. Serves 8.

Meals prepared in the common kitchen, the ladies eating alone unless they choose to have company. They can go visiting or to the seaside or where they will, if they can afford it.

"We are like friendly old mares," one old lady told a visitor, "who have lived busy useful lives and are then turned into fields of perpetual green clover."

Why there is nothing at Christmas time like a Willard Tree

THERE WERE a good many places in town where you could buy a Christmas tree. The markets had them and the florists had them and there was a vacant lot down the street where they sold them every year.

But Bob and Mary Travis preferred to drive through the snow to the Willard Nursery up in the country outside of town.

An expert in such matters would probably tell you that the trees sold at the Willard Nursery were no bigger or greener or fuller than the ones sold right around the corner. But to Bob and Mary Travis, Christmas would not be Christmas without a Willard tree.

They would bring it home trailing out of the luggage compartment of the car. And when they set it up in the living-room and started trimming it, they would both say what a lovely tree it was—and agree, as they had so many times before, that there was nothing like a Willard tree.

They had said so, now, for over twenty-five years. Because it was over twenty-five years since Bob Travis had sold his very first life insurance policy to Ben Willard. Bob was then just starting in as New York Life agent, and Ben was just starting the nursery up in the country outside of town. Bob had pointed out to him how the insurance might well serve as the foundation for ease and security in the Willards' later years . . . how the Willards might some day look on the nursery as a hobby rather than an occupation.

As time went on, the two men worked out even broader plans. And, as time went on, it had been fun for Bob Travis to see those plans work out on schedule. Now, as a result, the Willards were able to take winter vacations down South. And later on . . .

And that is why you can't always judge a Christmas tree by its size or its shape or the greenness of its boughs.

You have to allow a little bit for sentiment.

YULE COFFEE CAKE

1 cake compressed yeast, or 1 package dry yeast
¼ cup warm water
½ cup milk
¼ cup sugar
½ teaspoon salt
¼ cup soft butter
1 egg
3 cups sifted, all-purpose flour
⅓ cup finely-chopped, mixed candied fruit
¼ cup chopped glacé cherries
½ cup steamed seedless raisins

Dissolve yeast in lukewarm water. Scald milk. Add sugar, salt, butter. Cool to lukewarm. Add beaten egg and yeast, stirring well. Add 2¾ cups flour. Beat well. Knead on floured board 5 minutes. Butter top of dough. Cover in buttered bowl. Let rise in warm place until double in bulk (about 1 hr.). Pat into rectangle on lightly floured board. Sprinkle with fruit, raisins, nuts. Fold over, knead well. Divide into 8 smooth balls. In center of buttered 9-inch layer-cake pan place empty tin can buttered outside. Space balls evenly around can. Brush with butter. Cover; let rise until double. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 35 minutes. Turn onto rack to cool. Ice while warm with combined confectioners' sugar, milk, vanilla. A real "Merry Christmas-go-round!"

"As early as 1650 Massachusetts was on the self-righteous side. She was way out front in material prosperity and commercial development, and her relationships with the other colonies, even with England, became colored by an overbearing sense of dominance on her part, and a feeling of jealousy and often-justified resentment on the part of her rivals."

So says Henry F. Howe, in SALT RIVERS OF THE MASSACHUSETTS SHORE—which is really the history of Eastern Massachusetts through a microscope.

But the rest of the country, even now after three centuries, feels much the same about Massachusetts. Just the way, when you go back to a school reunion, there are the same cliques. No matter what may have happened to their members in the meantime, once back in the shade of Alma Mater, they fall into the same old pattern, leaders or led, snobs or colorless background.

While it's still around Christmastime, consider the snow that falls or Europe's highest volcano. It all belongs to the Archbishop of Catania, by an old medieval grant, and it brings him in a nice little revenue. We're talking about Mt. Etna, in Sicily, 10,758 feet high. Much snow falls on Etna, and for several thousand feet down from its crater it is almost perpetually snow-capped. Before summer sets in, the snow is shoveled into trenches, covered with fir-tree branches to keep off the sun, and thus packed into natural ice. This supplies a string of little summer-resort villages along the coast at the bottom of the mountain, and helps make ice cream. (Sicily is one of the birthplaces of ice cream.) In fact, it nets the church several thousand dollars a year.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES have lost much of their dread since science placed Penicillin in the capable hands of physicians.

The fact that Penicillin now is immediately available for any emergency depended on finding a way to manufacture it in large quantities and in uniform quality. Originally, it was made from cultures of molds grown in small glass flasks—a tedious and costly process. Then, developmental research men and chemical engineers applied their ingenuity to the problem. Today, Penicillin is produced in huge 15,000-gallon steel fermentation tanks—in tons instead of ounces—and at a price 97 per cent lower than seven years ago.

Experience with Penicillin later helped Merck produce another life-saving antibiotic, Streptomycin—the most effective substance known for reinforcing the treatment of tuberculosis. The story of our cities has more to it than any fiction—of glamour, heroics, personalities, dark corners of crime, swift changes of mood. One by one they are being written up. THE AMIABLE BALTIMOREANS, by Francis F. Beirne, is one of that excellent series.

Chapter 8, entitled "Belles and Beauties," will, we predict, be the best read. It covers the field from Betsy Patterson

WIDE WORLD

INCREDIBLE NEW YORK, by Lloyd Morris, may be the beginning of another series, put out by another publishing house. Though New York has been done to death, we defy anyone to stop reading this book! We've all got a bit tired of the heavy Astors and Vanderbilts and the Bradley-Martin ball, but the lighter-hearted days of The Gay White Way still are great fun.

"Tell me, pretty maiden, are there any more at home like you?" was such a song hit that Stanford White and Freddie Gebhard, well-known men-about-town, retained orchestra seats for every performance of Florodora, arriving when the famous sextet came on and departing after the last of the many encores. If you'd like to know the names of the original sextet, you'll find them here. The girls, that is. Each one married a millionaire, which no doubt started the first country-wide landslide of pretty girls into the chorus.

Then there was Maxine Elliott, the beautiful, who was constantly in the public eye, always completely surrounded by admirers, and was said to have been the recipient of a fabulous gold dinner service as a gift from her friend King Edward VII. For a time she was the wife of Nat Goodwin, who had many beautiful wives in the course of his life. "Being married to Maxine," he said, "is like being married to a Roman senator."

The book isn't all like that. Nor is New York. There is something in it for everybody.

There's a Man In The House

I've observed that the quickest way to end a husband-and-wife quarrel is to inject the name of somebody neither one of you likes. If done skillfully, this can induce an arms-around-the-neck armistice before it gets serious.

Our eleven-year-old and his chums average about $2 a day damage and wastage around the house. . . . But I'm quick to forgive him when I calculate that he also provides us at least $5 worth of stimulus and good clean fun every day too.

The man next door claims proudly that he's broiled more steaks and hot dogs this fall on his impromptu picnic oven, merely loose tiers of bricks and cinder blocks, than our friend in the next block on his $450 stone edifice. What's more, he can take it down to clean, and move it whenever he pleases, and even improve it.

"If we could bottle some of our surplus Christmas spirit," reflects Peter Comfort, hopefully hiding a big gift package in the garage, "and drop it on the Russians, maybe they'd quit pretending that Joe Stalin is Santa Claus."

At the big round luncheon table, our club's irrepressible cynic argues that a man who reads twenty books a year ought to be rated higher socially than the owner of a Cadillac. "But a Cadillac," he allows, "makes a bigger splash at the country club."

We men no longer challenge each other with "My dad can lick your dad!", but every man in our town thinks his beloved 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th grade teachers were far more wonderful than anybody else's teachers.

The more I see of the beauty queens chosen so often around our town, the more convinced I am that any man with a pretty wife makes a better judge in a beauty contest than any number of formidable women.

Our neighbor in the prefabricated-steel house groans that he's on his seventh reducing diet in two years. "And the best diet I ever had," he confides, "was when I had to eat on ninety cents a day as a young bachelor."

I'm convinced that the snarled-up five-o'clock traffic problem in our town could be solved if more men left their cars home for their wives and kept themselves young by walking downtown.

The prettiest woman I'd seen all day, in the block near the dime store, deglamourized herself instantly by smacking her small son just because he was tugging her skirt toward the candy display in the window. (She could have waited till she got him home!)

My wife, bless her, finished most of her Christmas shopping (much of it by phone) before she ordered the Thanksgiving turkey. Now she can use up her unexpended energy wrapping each $2 gift as if it were a diamond tiara.

Bravest sight I've seen this autumn: our neighbor with the three-car converted-stable garage, trying to fight his way out of the doghouse by attempting to tell his wife a funny story.

"Some of the cleverest women I know," confides Betty Comfort, handing her first batch of Christmas cards to the postman, "toy with drinks that only look like highballs, no whisky in 'em, and can act as silly as the silliest women in town."

I estimate that some of the more unpopular cheeses can remain in our icebox as long as five months before my Lady Love gets 'em used up in the form of toasted-cheese sandwiches.

Silliest argument I've overheard this year, on a transatlantic plane: whether Margaret Truman is as pretty as England's Princess Elizabeth. (My wife could have settled that one by calling 'em both the "loveliest girls with the sweetest dispositions and the loveliest skins.")

I'm torn between displaying my shotguns and rifles on a rack where I can admire, or locking 'em up so I won't need to worry about the boys' fooling with 'em. (The real solution, of course, is a rack with a foolproof lock!)

So far my Dream Girl refuses to take seriously my offer to eat crackers and milk for dinner once a week to keep the grocery bill down. To convince her I suppose I'll have to dine that way some evening when the rest of the family is eating roast beef.

Suddenly I'm aware that all my tools from the toolroom in the basement have become part of the decorative scheme in our youngest's bedroom. (If I insist on returning 'em, will I cause a psychic snarl in his personality which will force him to punch his boss in the nose in 1969?)

When I take a look at the bills about the ninth of the month I'm filled with regret: I should have realized at my wedding that a lovely wife would be expensive, and have begun immediately to spend at least twenty minutes a day scheming to get rich.

I mused while shaving that the more our fashionable ladies exploit sex in their dress and behavior, the more sex-starved their husbands seem to get. Every time one of our town's rich gals wears a sexy new costume her man seems to be off on the prowl.

America needs a modern Kipling to awake her and remind her that the boy next door is just as dramatic as Tommy Atkins when he sails or flies off 10,000 miles away to defend his folks—and the girl next door. (Whether she realizes it or not.)

I've yielded to our youngest's needling and agreed to take him to Toyland not once but twice between now and Christmas. He not only lets off steam there and makes it tough for the big store's Santa, but he damages toys I neither have to buy nor repair.

At least three times a week every husband in our block pities himself as a victim of matrimony, but ——

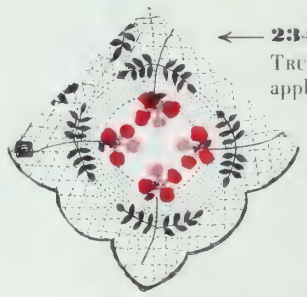
. . . When his daughter reads him aloud a poem he once loved so much that he memorized it,

. . . Or Junior announces he has already lined himself up a summer-vacation job for next year,

. . . And his youngest suddenly blossoms as the best twelve-year-old punter and forward-passer in the entire block.

. . . Or his beloved wife, after keeping the pressure on for a few weeks, suddenly relents and lets him have his way two or three times,

. . . And the whole family passes an evening together without a dull moment that passes like a flash,



Then he stops pitying himself and confesses to his shaving mirror that but for this lucky marriage and remarkable family he'd have been an awful sad sack.

Making Marriage Work

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS
Ph.D., Pennsylvania State College, Department of Psychology

You want your independence—and marriage too. You can have both—but you may forfeit happiness.

Personal Freedom in Marriage

"I'M old enough to do as I please." . . . "I want to be free to live my life in my own way." At some time or other, almost every adolescent child makes some such declaration to his parents. In a young person, this attitude is a form of growing pains, a normal rebellion against the increasing restraints and responsibilities imposed on the individual emerging from childhood to maturity.

But sometimes this attitude persists into adult life. Every marriage counselor is familiar with the individual, married or single, who puts his own personal happiness above all other values. Sometimes a wife or husband will say, "I didn't mean to give up my independence when I married. If I can't have my personal freedom, I want a divorce."

Such statements reveal immaturity. To insist upon complete personal freedom, to pursue personal happiness as an end in itself, is to admit that you have never grown up.

No successful marriage can result when either spouse exploits the mate. Complete freedom for one means slavery for the other. Co-operation and sharing are essential to every satisfying human relationship—most of all to marriage.

Before taking your marriage vows, make sure that your intended mate accepts responsibility, recognizes others' rights, and emphasizes long-term goals rather than immediate pleasures. Unless his past record and present behavior prove these things to be true, he probably isn't ready for marriage.

If you are already married, perhaps you are irked because your routine is confining, you have few personal pleasures, and you aren't free to do as you like. But are you sure your complaints are realistic? Check yourself on these everyday actions to see if you are carrying your share of the load:

- Joint decisions. When problems arise, do you assemble all the facts, then with your husband decide what should be done? Or do you either insist that he make the decision or require him to accept yours?
- Finances. Do you adjust your expenditures to his earnings, with a margin for savings? Or do you live up to the last dollar, feeling that it's up to him to make more money?
- Social life. Do you arrange social activities that he enjoys, can afford, and that don't interfere with his work routine? Or do you expect him to adjust himself to whatever suits you?
- Companionship. Do you share evenings at home with him, interest yourself in his job, and cheer him up when he is depressed? Or do you feel that evenings are your free time, for playing bridge with the girls or attending a club meeting while he amuses himself?
- Home chores. Do you attend to household chores as efficiently as most wives you know? Or do you neglect them, strain the budget to hire help, or postpone them for him to do evenings or week ends?
- Consideration. Do you show him you love him, praise his achievements, and seek ways to add to his comfort? Or do you insist that he conform to your pattern out of love for you?
- Working hours. Do you put in as many work hours as he does, on his job and home chores? Or do you feel abused because he works only 40 hours a week to your 63—forgetting, of course, your morning coffee with a neighbor, your afternoon nap, and the social hour or so on the telephone?

There is little real married happiness for a wife unless her husband is happy too. By insisting on personal freedom and pleasure, you may be risking your happiness as well as your husband's.

Can You Disagree Without Fighting?

AS in all close human relationships, disagreements are bound to occur in every marriage. In themselves, differences of opinion, of taste and interest, are not necessarily a bad thing, and if properly handled, they can even lend zest to the relationship.

But too often, when a problem arises, feelings get involved, and the argument leads to a quarrel instead of a solution. In many instances, the husband feels that he is entitled to make the decisions because it is he who earns the money to support the family. The wife is just as sure she knows best, because it is she who devotes full time to running the house and looking after the family. A satisfactory solution can never be reached under these circumstances, for no progress is possible when either spouse takes it for granted he is right.

The fact is that often neither is right. While there is only one right answer to an arithmetic problem, there may be several possible solutions to a marriage problem. The "right" one is the one which is most satisfactory to both partners. And this can never be determined if either husband or wife assumes infallibility.

In a recent survey concerning sources of friction in marriage, we discovered that the husbands' judgment is just as likely to be valid (acceptable to the wives) as the wives' to the husbands! Further, we found that on ten vital aspects of marriage, husbands and wives disagree almost as often as they agree. It's clear, then, that a technique must be found for handling disagreements if they are not to lead to arguments and quarrels.

How can this be done? The first principle is to remember that your husband is just as likely to be "right" as you are, even though he spends less time at home than you do. And remember the right answer must be acceptable to him as well as to you.

Make sure that you and your husband have all the facts. This requires nothing more than common sense, yet it is surprisingly often overlooked.

Don't conceal information from your husband, even to avoid an argument. If the discussion concerns money, don't hide the bill for your $20 shoes, even though you are sure the purchase was justified.

Until all the facts have been accumulated and accepted (there should be no need to compromise on facts), keep personal feelings out of the discussion. Save your opinions, your excuses or criticisms, till you both know the whole story.

Now comes the question of personal feelings and desires. If you explain to your husband why you wanted those particular shoes, how you planned to pay for them by saving somewhere else, perhaps he will understand—particularly if you are equally tolerant about his fishing rod. But if the purchase was unwise, admit it. Your husband is not likely to continue an argument he has already won.

This kind of management will not prevent disagreements, but it will certainly lessen quarrels. For no matter how the quarrel starts—whether because the car windows were left open, or dinner was late, or last month's bills too high—the basic cause is always the same: either or both partners' lack of insight. The simple procedure we have described is designed to substitute for insight while promoting its development.

Are You a Loving Wife?

Some wives are wonderful housekeepers, but their relationship to their husbands is neither loving nor tender. By carefully answering these questions yes or no, you may evaluate this personal relationship.

1. Are you free from any regret about marrying?
2. Is he physically quite attractive to you?
3. Do you kiss your husband every day?
4. If unmarried, would you marry him?
5. Is he free from objectionable habits?
6. Do you confide everything to him?
7. Are you two socially well matched?

Do You and Your Husband Almost Always Agree on:

8. Your demonstrations of affection?
9. Matters of recreation?
10. Your separate philosophies of life?
11. Etiquette and table manners?
12. Matters of convention?
13. Handling family finances?
14. Settling arguments by mutual give and take?

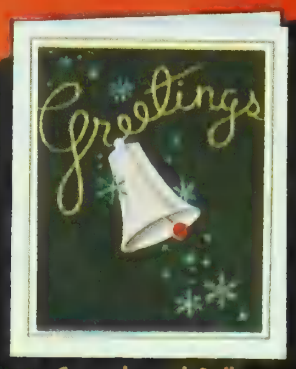
Count your "yes" answers. Top scores are 12 or more, with the average being 10. With scores of 9 or less, something is definitely lacking in your spiritual and physical relationship. It will take your husband's co-operation if improvement is to result.

Do You Agree?

Isn't the average man a better husband if he has had sexual experience before marriage?



No. Apart from the obvious risks of venereal disease and the girl's pregnancy, the man is likely to acquire serious misconceptions about sex, and what he should expect from a wife.

boys say

the trouble with girls is...

. . . "They get a mother complex on a guy when they date him. They're always telling you that you shouldn't smoke, or other little things you enjoy doing—like bowling or getting lousy marks in school. They have a typical mother quality of always trying to improve everybody—and it definitely doesn't go over with most fellows. Girls should appreciate a fellow for what he is."

. . . "They try to include their girl friends in on everything—like if you ask a girl if you can walk her home and she says, 'I've got to bring my friend along too'; or the 'intermediaries', who are always trying to get dates for their friends and make a John Alden out of the fellow—as if he's scared to ask a girl out. This retards both girls. It's nice for girls to have lots of friends, but they shouldn't carry it too far. There's a place for everything."

. . . "They give out too many compliments. All the time you're with them they're telling you what a good-looking suit you've got on, or what a swell dancer you are, et cetera, et cetera, until it almost seems as if they're being sarcastic. Compliments are fine—every guy likes them, but he likes to feel they're sincere and that he really deserves them. So a girl should give one if she really thinks so—but not mention something about him all evening long."

. . . "Too many are car hounds. Honest—if a guy has a car in this world, he's set. Girls are always hanging around wanting a ride, and then if you give them a ride, they beg for a chance to drive. If a guy is smart, he'll test the girl by not bringing his car for a couple of dates, and suggesting the bus instead. If she says okay, he knows she really likes him. Girls should get wise to this."

. . . "They don't always give the fellow a chance to be a gentleman. They should wait for the fellow to open the car door, or get the coats. It embarrasses a boy if a girl forgets things like this. Worse still, she should never wipe off the silverware and glasses in a restaurant. Some girls do this all the time, and it really makes a fellow feel like a cheap skate, as if he were taking her to a dump. A girl should remember a boy's self-respect."

. . . "They try to act bold and older than they are. They want a night club instead of a show, they ask you to smoke because it looks 'so manly,' and they think you're real terrific if you drink. This is wrong and foolish. They should learn to enjoy some of the simple things in life. A girl should ask a guy where he wants to go—and when she gets back home again, she shouldn't forget to thank him and say she had fun. It encourages a fellow to ask her out again."

. . . "They give fellows the wrong impression by being seen at the hangout every afternoon and evening, just sitting around doing nothing, waiting for some fellow to come take them out. These girls depend too much on chasing fellows to get dates. They try to rush it too much. A guy respects a girl who stays home sometimes, and who has other things on her mind besides dating him. If he wants to date her, he'll find her."

. . . "They're too sarcastic and pull too many wisecracks on a guy. Like they overhear your conversation and break in to make a crack like, 'You're such a brilliant conversationalist, I just couldn't help listening.' A fellow doesn't always know how to take this, but chances are good that he won't spend any time dating that girl. Girls should try to be more of a friend and buddy to boys than trying to get your ring and be infatuated with you, or make a great love out of a few casual dates. They should be someone you can talk to about your problems, too—more mature and understanding, as if they really liked you. With some girls you can have a real conversation—about the things that interest you most—and they're the girls who get the most dates."

What do boys want for Christmas?

This question appeared in our mailbox so many times last year that this year we decided to beat you to it by asking our Sub-Deb Press Club correspondents to take a special poll of boys all over the country. And here are the results. Most boys said they didn't want gifts that were "too personal"—like jewelry or clothing—unless they were going steady. Some suggested phonograph records, others said they'd settle for a good sports book. Something to eat is always good; and if he has a car, give him a new accessory—"Nothing big, just something to add a little class, maybe, like a fender guide, curb scraper or tire gauge." A large group of boys said they would prefer something handmade—"depending on how well the girl can make it"—because it shows more thought. Tops among handmade gifts: bright-colored Argyle socks or Argyle sweaters with the boy's name on the sleeve. If you're going steady, you may want to exchange twin sweaters or T shirts. Or a photograph of yourself taken especially for him. Price of any gift should not exceed five dollars—better less—"or the guy might feel too obligated." Don't try to improve him—"I'm getting a tie or tie clasp," one boy said unhappily; "it's all part of a conspiracy to make me dress up." Christmas is for fun, so give your fellow something you think he'll like—and something that shows that you like him!

Competition—and thrills

SAVAGE

Tenley Albright

Tenley Albright—a sixteen-year-old figure-skating champion—says she got her start because she had polio. It wasn't a bad case, but her muscles needed strengthening, so her dad bought her some new white figure skates and took her to a nearby rink. Tenley liked it so much that she started lessons with Willie Frick, once a famous skater himself, and today—five years later—has won seven important figure-skating titles. This month she's competing for an even bigger thrill: a berth on the U. S. Olympic skating team. To participate in skating meets, she's seen most of the forty-eight states and Canada, last summer visited Italy and Germany, and has big plans for two months in Europe this winter—if she can get her Latin and algebra done in advance first! "Skating is more fun than anything," she says, "because it's creative and exciting and different every time, but when it comes to a career, I'll probably be a doctor like my dad." Nevertheless, she's chosen Radcliffe College—"because there's a good skating rink nearby."

In December the roads wind through dazzling snow, the trees cast blue shadows, the brooks break through a shield of crystal.

Diary of Domesticity

By GLADYS TABER

THE countryside is lovely when the first snows begin; the old gray-stone fences are silvered over, the roads wind through dazzling fields, the brooks break through a shield of crystal. The pine trees on the slope cast blue clean shadows, and when I walk toward them, a hundred birds flutter out. The winter birds keep the old pines quivering; early in the morning wings dart to the feeding stations, the suet and peanut butter are attacked, the grains scatter on the white snow. They have a routine: different hours for different kinds of birds; and I always mean to set up a little calendar and learn their schedule.

Getting ready for Christmas, I find I have, as usual, mislaid those Christmas cards I bought last August. In a modern house there would be no excuse for me, but in 1690, when Stillmeadow was built, peo ple never seemed to need storage space, so they provided only a few cupboards and a couple of closets under slanting roofs. Our very best closet can be negotiated only by crawling on hands and knees. The result is that all the chests of drawers hold everything from magazines to ear muffs! And if we make lists of where everything is, the lists lose themselves at once, so we are hunting again.

The Christmas turkey comes from the freezer, plump and amiable, and Jill struggles to find a place to let it thaw that Daphne can't reach. She does love turkey. And it isn't really that she is more predatory than Maeve, just that she is hungrier. She has filled out now and her coat is burnished flame. When the two Irishers run across the snow they look almost like twins until you see their faces. Daphne's face is still ingenuous and schoolgirlish and terribly vulnerable.

She is going to school now, and passionate about it. There are times when she seems steadied by the Obedience traini And times like this morning when she up early, opened the locked back door, herself out, slammed the door behind and went to the pond to see if any fr might still be around. On the way back ate a bath towel hanging on the line, ca in, closed the door, got the only cashm sweater we have from a shelf, and suaded Tiki to play tug of war. T around seven, she came in and jumped and down on me to suggest that she lonesome and why didn't I get up and some breakfast for everybody?

Tiki finished his Companion Dog deg before he was ten months old, and h happily engaged in learning what dur bells are for. With sixteen Obedience grees in two years, we are more and m conscious of how happy an educated do and I wish every dog in the country co have at least the first degree, and w easily at heel instead of tearing the own arms from their sockets when they g walk. 50 years ago in the Journal

IN December, 1901, Marconi received the first transatlantic wireless message, the letter S repeated over and over. Anna Held and Julia Marlowe brightened Broadway; the new four-buckle "arctics" were seen everywhere, and skirts became "decidedly short"—two to four inches off the ground.

Writes Editor Bok in the December, 1901, JOURNAL: "Some readers object to the corset advertisements in the JOURNAL, which are seen by members of both sexes. Yet you will never see a patent-medicine advertisement in the JOURNAL, nor any for liquor, or for mining, or real-estate investment. For the slightest objectionable wording the most profitable advertisement is rejected."(Still true.)

Beauty: "The only virtue in going by the new moon when clipping your hair is that it tends to regularity. Hair does not grow more rapidly when singed."

"White slippers and stockings are usually worn with white evening dresses."

"Linen collars are two and a half inches wider than they were last season."

Remarks Mrs. Rorer, "Winter vegetables are cabbage, kale, celery, beets, salsify, parsnips, chicory, turnips, carrots, Jerusalem artichokes (the root of a sunflower) and onions. It is scarcely worth while to use canned goods when one can get so many fresh vegetables."

"The new sleeves are made flat and tight to the elbow. From elbow to wrist they are slashed, puffed and pleated, and finished with a snugly fitting buttoned cuff."

Says The Lady From Philadelphia: "Do not try and make a gift look like more than you paid for it. Aside from the paltry spirit, next year your gift must seem to be as fine as this season's."

Journal about Town

Gossip about people you know, Editors you like, and what goes on in New York

General Eisenhower entertaining (left to right) John H. Cline, Washington Star; Albert Pickerell, Department of State; James Thrasher, Collier's; Bruce Gould; the General himself; and, back to camera, Martin Hayden, Detroit News, at SHAPE headquarters, Marly, France. Members of party not shown included Harlan (There's a Man in the House) Miller, Des Moines Register; Wright Bryan, Atlanta Journal; Frank R. Ford, Evansville Press; Robert Grannis, Brooklyn Eagle; Vance Johnson, San Francisco Chronicle; Raymond Lawrence, Oakland Tribune; Paul Martin, Gannett News Service; Merrill Panitt, Philadelphia Inquirer; Gideon Seymour, Minneapolis Star & Tribune; Richard Sherman, Harper's; Major Walter H. Sibbert, Department of Army; and John B. Adams, of the Department of Defense.

THE man many people think may be our next President, General Eisenhower, was the first man Bruce Gould saw in Paris when he recently made a seven-country, 18,000-mile tour of Europe and the Near East under the joint auspices of the Defense and State Departments of our Government. He didn't ask General "Ike" whether he would like to be President "Ike." Several of the journalists on the tour did.

As skilled a diplomat as soldier—which is pretty skilled—"Ike" fended off all inquiries. Most of the inquirers left with the impression that "Ike" doesn't "want" to be President—would only "consent to run" if it seemed that an "isolationist" might capture the White House.

Working out of Paris, London, Frankfurt, Berlin, Rome, Naples, Marseille, Belgrade, Athens, Istanbul and Ankara, the visiting journalists saw how our modern war matériel is actually reaching its objective; that is, used by the individual French, Italian, Greek and Turkish soldiers and airmen, who, incidentally, are being trained in the use of American-type arms both by their own noncommissioned officers previously trained in the U. S., and by our own officers attached to these armies.

As part of watching the actual training of the soldiers, Mr. Gould, from a slight rise near Ankara, had the experience of facing a wildly yelling Turkish battalion charging with fixed bayonets, firing as they came. He had been told the Turkish soldiers sometimes get so excited that, even in practice, they bloody their bayonets. And, in fact, the charge swept past a Turkish colonel with the journalists who vainly tried to stop it. Later Mr. Gould learned the Turks were not shooting blanks, as everyone thought, but wooden bullets—which are frangible—but the colonel felt they were too close for comfort. So would have the journalists had they realized that more than yells were whistling past their ears.

Mr. Gould came back with the feeling that, with General Eisenhower either as European commander or American President to watch American interests, our billions spent overseas to halt Russia before she can get started are being well spent, and that we should back him with our hearts as well as our purse.

His most optimistic conclusion: he believes real progress, under the constant Russian threat of war, is being made toward a United States of Europe—the goal of many top European statesmen, as well as Eisenhower. This step might eventually lead toward mankind's greatest hope—pretty dim on any horizon as long as Communist Russia exists as a power threat—a united world.

THE JOURNAL'S
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

DOUG CAMPBELL was half an hour early at the consulate, but there were already a couple of fräuleins waiting in the outer office and he strode past them angrily.

It wasn't for this he'd boned for the State Department examinations. This wasn't what he'd pictured when he plumped for Foreign Service after three years' fighting with the French Resistance and in further tougher pockets of Intelligence work after that. For his first post they'd given him this minor consulship in the American Zone and, seeing how things were going in Germany, he'd jumped at it. And what was his speciality? Vital international decisions? Ha. Wise administration of policy? Ha-ha. Spread of American democratic ideals? Ha. Ha. And again ha.

No. He was the War Bride Division, Lonely Hearts Club, Overseas Branch, picking up the pieces after the Occupation Romeos who'd been ordered home, and snooping into the details of current Occupation romances which had reached the legal, or take-home, stage. He was the local Beatrice Fairfax, only worse off than Bee had ever been because the girls could—and did—talk back to him. Talk, cry, and faint all over the place. Embattled mothers could—and did—scream at him, and enraged Yank suitors . . . oh, forget it. His transfer'd come through any time now, the wires he'd pulled.

His secretary, ex-Wac-corporal Jones, stuck her early-morning face in the door and observing the thundercloud roosting on his brow, growled a disrespectful "Gr-rr" at it. The boss was strictly business—if he'd ever had an eye for the girls, this job had cured him—but she liked to see a laugh make his dark face look young and Yank again in spite of the streak of gray hair that ran back from the scar on his temple.

Ex-corporal Jones just loved Germany, having arrived there too late to see a Panzer division mow down a roadful of refugees or get a whiff of Dachau, and she loved her job with the heartthrobs, standing by with the spirits of ammonia while Doug told Gerta that Sergeant Joe Tompkins was already married and had a six-month-old baby in the States. Just hadn't had the heart to tell her till the papers came through. While he told Katie it was too bad, but Private First Class Schmaltz hadn't ever took-it-serious and was surprised she had. Filed intentions? Sure, but that was way back last June.

"O.K., Jonesy," Doug told his secretary now, his grin coming through the way she liked. "Send in the first one while I take a gander at her papers."

But the first one was already wavering on the threshold, clutching a shabby purse bulging (how well he knew) with frayed, creased forms. English forms, German forms, Army, medical and civilian forms, probably a few church papers for good measure, and at the bottom, even more frayed and ten to one dated months ago, a couple of letters from whoever the guy had been. There was some trouble about a box, too, a little carved wooden chest she was dragging behind her. He groaned. She must be the one who got all the way to Ellis Island and the groom had jumped his bond and disappeared. The Immigration Office reported relatives just shrugged their shoulders. woman Doug had ever loved — and he was losing her to another man

At last she was in my house—the house where she should have been mistress

I had no sense of foreboding when we sat talking together that last evening, before Ambrose set out on his final journey. . . . I, Philip Ashley, had grown up on my cousin's estate in Cornwall; Ambrose was my guardian, my family—my world. I was twenty-three when he went to spend a winter in Italy for his health. He met there a distant connection of the family, the Contessa Sangalletti—or Cousin Rachel.

When he wrote later that he had married her, I was stunned. Ambrose, a bachelor for forty-three years! My godfather, Nick Kendall, and the tenants were pleased. But Seecombe, in charge of our menservants, shared my foreboding. Ambrose's letters began to change. At last he wrote two desperate notes, calling Rachel his torment and begging me to come. I left at once for Florence, only to find when I arrived that Ambrose had died three weeks before. Signor Rainaldi, Rachel's business manager, said that she had gone away, he did not know where.

Overcome by a sense of loneliness and helplessness, I returned to England. A few weeks later, Nick Kendall, now my guardian, told me that Rachel was in England, had brought Ambrose's effects back to me as Ambrose's sole heir. I did not know what I would say to the woman who had driven him to his death, but Louise Kendall, my childhood companion, helped prepare my bachelor household for a woman's visit.

On the day Rachel came, I stayed away from the house until late. When I returned, Seecombe said she had dined in her room, but would receive me later. I went upstairs, and knocked upon the door of the little boudoir.

A LOW voice, almost inaudible, bade me come in. Although it was now dark and the candles had been lit, the curtains were not drawn, and she was sitting on the window seat looking out onto the garden. Her back was turned to me. She must have thought me one of the servants, for she did not move when I entered the room. Don lay before the fire, his muzzle in his paws, the two young dogs beside him.

"Good evening," I said; and my voice sounded strained and unnatural.

She turned, and rose at once, and came toward me. My first feeling was one of shock, almost of stupefaction, that she should be so small. She barely reached my shoulder.

She was dressed in deep black, which took the color from her face, and there was lace at her throat, and at her wrists. Her hair was brown, parted in the center, with a low knot behind; her features neat and regular. The only things large about her were the eyes, which at first sight of me widened in sudden recognition, startled, like the eyes of a deer; and from recognition to bewilderment, from bewilderment to pain, almost to apprehension. I saw the color come into her face, and go again; and I think I was as great a shock to her as she was to me.

I stared down at her, and she looked up at me, and it was a moment before either of us spoke. When we did, it was to speak together.

"I hope you are rested," was my stiff contribution, and hers, "I owe you an apology." She followed up my opening swiftly with, "Thank you, Philip, yes," and moving toward the fire, she sat down on a low stool beside it, and motioned me to the chair opposite. Don, the old retriever, stretched and yawned, and placed his head upon her lap.

"This is Don, isn't it?" she said, putting her hand on his nose. "Was he really fourteen last birthday?"

"Yes," I said, "his birthday is a week before my own."

"You found him in a piecrust with your breakfast," she said. (Continued on Page 68)

"It's what I wear at breakfast," she said. "Ambrose used to call it my mum robe. Are you embarrassed?"

Urda has a Silver Dollar

By SKULDA V. BANÉR

PA slipped it into my hand. And I knew even before I looked what it was. It filled my wet palm. It got warmer and warmer until it ran black sweat. "A dollar!" I said. I stood and looked at it and it was as big as the world. "A whole silver dollar!"

Pa just stood grinning there against the golden-oak parlor door. "You are ten now, Urda," he said. "Every year before, we have helped you buy for Christmas, your ma and me. This Christmas you are ten. This Christmas you are old enough to learn how big or how small a dollar can be."

I looked up at him, across all the flowers that were the parlor: flowers in the carpet, flowers climbing the walls, flowers painted on the lamp shade, flowers behind glass high up near the ceiling. Pa's hand, that was pinching up snuff from the silver box, was a rusty pink that never washed off. Pa's face, too, around the big upper lipful of mustache that looked almost white against the pink. I used to think how strange it was, pa's coming up pink out of the black mine deep under the ground. But that was before I was ten and understood about iron-ore rust.

"I can buy whatever I want, pa?" I said, bending again to the dollar and touching it with my finger tip. "So much money! I can buy almost the whole Bergmans' store!"

Pa laughed. "When you learn how to make a dollar so big," he said, "be good and come and tell me, too, Urda?"

But I hardly heard him. I was already a flame of impatience to stand there in the little Bergman store, and buy and buy and buy. I could see, even, how the packages would look, ma's, pa's. My small brother Lars'. Mine. With unmined mystery still in them, I could see them, brown-paper wrapped and tied with verse, under the tree on Christmas morning.

"Well," pa said, "guess I'll go up and sleep a little."

He went, and left me to shut the parlor door upon its memories of buryings and Sewing Society and Lars' christening and a precious procession of Christmas trees that were all one.

Ma was pressing sprits in the kitchen. The whole kitchen was full of the smell of butter-baking and crisped almonds. The oven was full of sprits baking, and the tin on the table was covered with sprits making. And the earthenware crock that ma used to brew juniper-berry ale, summers, was already half filled. I said, ma, could I have one? And ma said, two, take two.

"If you could have anything in the world for Christmas, ma," I said, nipping the top curve off the butter-pastry S that chewed almond bits down to its last crumb, "if you could, ma, what would you want most?"

Ma brushed the hair that wasn't there, off her forehead. It left flour where her hand had touched. "I've got everything I want for Christmas right here," ma said.

"But that's not for me to buy," I said. "Out of a whole dollar!"

Ma knew about the dollar, it seemed. But when I thought about it, I understood. Pa wouldn't spend a whole dollar unless ma knew.

"You have Lars and pa to buy for," ma said. "And a little something for yourself. Don't forget yourself, Urda."

I pushed the tail of the last sprits into my mouth, and wished I need never swallow. "Will Lars have things to give?"

I Was a Princess

I AM alone in my peaceful white kitchen. The pots and pans shine brightly. The curtains are gay. I who have lived behind an Iron Curtain, who have faced the accidental death of war and the purposeful death of assassination, have found sanctuary. The peaceful shadows are gathering in the silent house, for I am alone, though not lonely; so many thoughts keep me company. In this big, old New England house there are two rooms I would like to show you; two rooms which hold my present and my past, the substance from which I must create my future. Which will surprise you more—my shining kitchen with every device for American housekeeping, or my bedroom upstairs with its unrelated collection of things from another life? I do not know. I cannot judge how these things will seem to you.

Wearing tiara of sapphires and diamonds (brought to U.S. wrapped in nightgown because she was too poor to insure it), Princess Ileana of Romania was photographed in 1946. Tiara, made for Russian Empress, was worn by Ileana's mother, Queen Marie, at her coronation in 1922. Three gems (about size of man's watch) are star sapphires. Tiara was wedding gift to Ileana. It was sold to pay debts, make payment on house in Newton, Mass., and bring children to U.S.

Thrifty shopper, the princess talks over best buys with Newton food dealer. Family moved into new home with only seven chairs, seven beds and magnificent Oriental rug made for Czar Alexander III. They ate in kitchen until, with $25 earned giving lecture, Ileana bought secondhand dining-room table. Another thrifty purchase: her wool suit, $7 in Filene's basement. All six children have scholarships. Besides English they speak Romanian, German, Spanish.

Now, in New England kitchen, Ileana—daughter of a king and queen, great-granddaughter of Queen Victoria—cooks, does washing and gives prayerful thanks that her six children have found security and schooling in U.S.

By PRINCESS ILEANA

with the help of Dorothy Kuenzli Hinckley

When at seventeen I visited the United States with my mother, reporters used to ask me, "What is it like—to be a princess?" and I could never think of anything to say in answer. How could I compare it with something else when I had never been anything except a princess? One is what one is; and it is not so simple to describe oneself as it is to describe one's surroundings! In Romania, for example, there was a trumpeter who blew a lovely call—a succession of quick, golden notes—when any of us entered or left the palace. Here I come quietly into my own drive; a passing neighbor may nod pleasantly; my key unlocks the door into my silent hall. In Austria a very formal and official letter to me would be addressed, "Ihre Kaiserliche und Königliche Hoheit die Durchlauchtigste Erzherzogin und Frau"—"Her Imperial and Royal Highness the Most Illustrious Archduchess and Small fry of household are Magi, 12 (left), whose full name is Maria Magdalene, and Elizabeth, 10 (right), called Herzi, "Little Heart." First task for Princess each day is to wash and hang out clothes—which she finds easier than doing week's laundry at once, since she suffers from arthritis and bursitis. Little girls help by bringing in clothes, setting table, stacking dishes in dishwasher. Both go to Tenacre School, Wellesley, where Magi is in sixth grade, Herzi in fourth. They are good students.

Like other housewives in U.S., the Princess finds beef stew welcome answer to high cost of meat. Stew was first dish she cooked when "with no earthly idea how to prepare a meal" she undertook to feed her hungry children in new home. Servantless Ileana marvels at electric range which cooks dinner unwatched. At Sonnberg Castle in Austria she had staff which included housekeeper, cook, kitchenmaid, nursemaid, laundress, three housemaids and chauffeur.

Youngest daughter of Queen Marie and King Ferdinand, Ileana was "loved and happy little girl" who shared mother's fondness for romantic dress as well as serious interest in social welfare. With King she avidly read Bulldog Drummond. Her two sisters—both married before Ileana was 13—became Queens of Greece and Yugoslavia.

INTERNATIONAL

As royal "Glamour Girl," rumor had Princess engaged to dozens of suitors, including Prince of Wales. In 1926 she toured United States with brother, Prince Nicholas, and mother, pictured above on palace terrace at Sinaia. Talented artist, sculptor, Ileana was also good at sports. She loves ocean, had her own yacht. All that remains are some dishes bearing its name, Isprava ("The Fortunate Adventure").

In five-spanned coach, wearing silver-embroidered wedding gown, Ileana rode to become bride of Anton, Archduke of Austria, July 21, 1931. King Carol, brother, beside her above, led her to altar. (Father died in 1927.) Among wedding gifts were inkwell made by Crown Prince Michael, airplane from King Carol, and two snow-white pigeons, symbolizing love and fidelity in peasant tradition.

What is it like—to be a princess? Shall we find the answer in these two rooms I am inviting you to look at? Let us suppose that quite suddenly you are told that in twenty-four hours you must leave your home forever. You can take hardly more than you can literally carry—a few boxes perhaps. And even so, some things you are forbidden to touch. Meanwhile a few of your neighbors quietly try to spirit away some of your possessions which they can hide until you come for them. When you have finally assembled again these treasures selected under the pressure of anxiety and grief, you will sometimes wish that a few of the choices had been different ones!

It is so with me. On one wall of my kitchen is a picture of mamma in Romanian dress amongst her flowers. For the background of the picture stands Bran, our fairy castle upon a rock, where once I lived. On another wall I have an old icon of Christ, the symbol of that faith which has carried me through all my troubles, and has landed me here on my feet in New England, with the strength to live again. Yes, to live again; because after I left home, which for

But inside, the "me" that was me independently of the mother, the wife, the friend—the essential "me" upon which all the rest is built—suffered a mortal shock when my life was severed from my people. So I had to start again, not only outwardly but especially inwardly. Getting down to brass tacks in my kitchen helped me greatly. The need to busy my hands quieted my mind. The effort to cope with simple things and to do them well helped me to overcome.

How shall I ever forget that first day, when I stood in my grand, new kitchen with no idea of how to cook a meal! I had no inkling of how things were stewed, boiled, broiled, roasted or baked. "Ah!" you say. "That is what it is like to be a princess! Not to learn any useful

SEABROOK PLANTATION

By RICHARD PRATT
Architectural Editor of the Journal

IN 1810 on Edisto Island, about thirty miles below Charleston, a man named William Seabrook, with a fortune from sea-island cotton burning a hole in his pocket, built this beauty of an Adamesque mansion. The house is as hard to come upon by car today (and as rewarding when you do) as any fine old tidewater establishment in Virginia or Maryland, and for the same reason that most of them originally were mainly reached by sailing boat. In those days down here, when cotton, rice and indigo were creating Carolina wealth, this was considered one of the handsomest of Low Country plantation houses. Right now it is even more of a rarity, for among the surviving great houses of the region probably none has been restored with greater skill, taste and largess. It's practically certain William Seabrook would approve the way it looks again.

The two-tiered piazza and high basement are in the Charleston-Low Country tradition.

◀ Old carpet and old paper faithfully reproduced help the handsomeness of the wonderful Seabrook hallway, with its gracefully divided and united staircase that frames the garden doorway and its view down across terraces and pools to a distant tidewater inlet.

INTERIOR PHOTOGRAPHS BY EZRA STOLLER

▲ The dining room, with its Adam detailing and drape paper, sparkling with crystal, English china and early-American silver, opens into the hallway through triple doors under a glazed flat arch like the entrance into the drawing room opposite.

◀ The drawing room is a dream of the Adamesque perfection which was the fashion of Federal times, when the Seabrook house was built. Notice how subtly the patterns are related in the satin of the Hepplewhite sofa, the paper and even the hooked hearth rug.

Political Pilgrim's Progress

When a woman makes up her mind

The collapse of the crime syndicates depends most of all upon how long it takes the American women to make up their minds to knock them over.

By HODDING CARTER

AMONG the inherited books in my library is an amusing relic published in 1890 and titled Manners, Culture and Dress of the Best American Society. Most of its stilted discourses on proper conduct are today as laughable as they are outmoded; but in the chapter on Conversation one admonition echoes ruefully: "In talking with ladies of ordinary education, avoid political, scientific or commercial topics and choose only such subjects as are likely to be of interest to them."

The year that guidebook to proper behavior was published, my grandmother and great-grandmother were busily disregarding in New Orleans its suggested restrictions upon female talk and action. Instead they were discussing politics and certain "commercial subjects"—legalized gambling, for instance—with unladylike vigor; for the finally aroused Louisiana citizenry, spurred by most of the clergy and a considerable number of determined wives, were engaged in a death battle with the sinister Louisiana Lottery, which for more than twenty years had almost literally owned the politicians and manipulated the purse strings of the state.

The lottery company had been granted a long-time gambling-monopoly charter in 1868 by a corrupt Reconstruction legislature. By bribery, intimidation and generous gifts to hospitals, schools, churches, levee districts—and legislators—it had maintained its monopolistic position for twenty-two years, and in the process had made a net profit of from three to five million dollars a year. After several attempts to legislate the lottery out of business or to permit competition had failed, most of the antilottery citizens gave up the fight about 1880. The lottery's reign was almost undisputed for ten years. Then the ladies, the ministers, and old and new antilottery leaders joined in a state-wide attack. Their gubernatorial candidate won, with the lottery-charter extension as the only issue. That was the end of the lottery.

The embattled ladies were frowned upon by their genteel sisters and derided by the lottery's spokesmen and the public officials who fattened upon lottery bribes. From old family letters and from my grandmother's recollections, I know that the fight was not pleasant for anyone, and especially for the women involved. But it was won largely because those Louisiana women, sickening of the debauchery of their state, goaded husbands and sons and fathers to destroy the octopus. Their courage and their persistence won at least temporary respite from graft and legalized immorality before they settled down again to "subjects that are likely to be of interest to them."

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

POLITICS IS ALSO YOUR BUSINESS.

The story of the Louisiana Lottery and its destruction singularly parallels in many respects the sordid tale unfolded by the Kefauver Committee. The lottery and today's national gambling syndicates alike depended upon a noisome alliance of big-time gambler-racketeer and dishonest officialdom. Each fattened because of public indifference to or ignorance of what was going on. Each proved that disinterest in politics leads inevitably to plundering, and that the plunderers, once entrenched, protect themselves by further debauching the body politic and intimidating the rash challenger. Each created in the public mind a dangerous cynicism as to the democratic processes and the motivations of elected officials. And each began to topple when ignorance and indifference were replaced by the slow, terrible wrath of the American public.

As the lottery fell, so surely will fall the crime syndicates of today. How

POLITICAL

The Political Pilgrim's Primer

By MARGARET HICKEY

POLITICS is not an occasional duty to be put aside after one victory. The "back room boys" are waiting for the political pilgrim to get tired. They know from experience that's what most voters do: they fail to register, or bad weather keeps them home from the polls, or they become discouraged with slow progress. So the machine just waits, relying on the theory that it can beat any reform if it waits long enough.

So once you make your start, follow through with a step-by-step plan. Persistent effort will pay off in better government for you and your family.

Register.* Find out from the city clerk or election board where and when. Almost all cities of 10,000 require that voters be officially registered; and always reregister when you change your residence or your name.

Prepare* now for 1952 elections. Talk with leaders of your party and attend precinct and ward meetings. So that you won't have to choose between poor candidates at election time, work actively for qualified people at party caucuses and primaries. If you have no party choice or want to be an independent, talk with the League of Women Voters about candidates and issues.

Vote*, and get all the eligibles in your family and neighborhood to do so. Circle dates on your calendar for party primaries, general and special elections. Apply for absentee ballot if ill or out of town.

Check up* on what officials are doing. Don't hesitate to criticize them, but give a word of praise when they do a good job.

Report* your progress, even though it may seem slow. The JOURNAL wants the story of just how you are getting along.

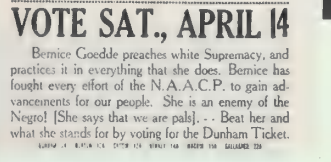
In October, 1949, we told the story of Bernice Goedde's election to the school board in East St. Louis, Illinois, and of the citizens' fight to take their schools out of politics. Now we tell how the old machine came back. Here's a lesson for every political pilgrim if a people's machine is to make lasting progress.

BABES IN THE WOODS AGAINST THE SHARP BOYS

Bernice Goedde gave her city the best school-board administration it had had in decades. She lost out not because of broken promises, but because of her failure to learn and play good politics.



"WE were out to gitcha and we gotcha," sneered the drink-sodden precinct committeeman as he pushed his face up to Bernice Goedde, the first woman school-board president in the history of East St. Louis, Illinois, schools.

Bernice turned away in disgust, but she had to agree. They had certainly got her and her entire slate of candidates. The returns on the wall of the board of election commissioners' office backed up the loose-tongued committeeman's boast. There on the blackboard was the people's answer to three years of the best school-board administration the city had known for many a decade.

"What do people want?" kept running through her mind. Why would her fellow citizens give such overwhelming support to her school ideals three years ago and turn their backs on her now? Had she failed to deliver what she had promised? No, that wasn't it, for she and the twelve-member board supporting her ideas had fulfilled their promises to the electorate to the limit.

G. HARRIS

While Bernice Goedde did a good job and kept out of "politics," her opponents carried on a campaign of prejudice to defeat her.

As Bernice pushed her way through the political hangers-on who frequent the election commissioners' office on any election night, she could not deny the facts. Back in 1948, when she ran for the school-board presidency, 16,303 voters had approved her outspoken platform of reform in the schools. And now, just three years later, only 17,000 East St. Louisans bothered to vote and she couldn't poll even 5000 votes.

"Our reform movement is dead," she said bitterly.

Bernice was learning the hard way why professional politicians have smiled wisely at all reform movements for centuries past. Reform is so easy to beat. All you have to do is wait. The "I'd have voted if ——" that keeps so many voters at home is the secret weapon in the arsenal of the professional politician.

And now Bernice, who is also an architect, sits in the cluttered office of the Goedde Lumber Co., which she manages, and between working out bids for defense contracts tries to figure out what happened.

When it was a matter of "throwing the rascals out" in 1948, the people of East St. Louis were eager to recover their schools from decades-old political control. Endorsement came from the trade-unions and from such opposites as the Bartenders' Union and the Young Women's Christian Association. Women of the Business and Professional Women's Club worked six to eight hours a day distributing ballots to each house in the city for their fellow member. This kind of support continued until 1950, when every member of the board had been elected as a member of the independent party endorsed by Bernice. Reform was in high gear.

The bulky file cabinet that still sits within easy reach of her office desk holds the story of those three years: no more politics in the hiring and firing of teachers; a modern maintenance system; a free hand to the administrative staff; a rental book system; an adequate insurance program; segregation ended; and the school system taken off state probation.

"What else do you have to do in public office? We thought that good work would speak for itself," Bernice said after the election.

Bernice might understand the lack of support from some groups, but she cannot understand the attitude of the Business and Professional Women's Club. The club members talked her into running for office in the first place, the members supported her vigorously during the first elections, but now . . . on Election Day, 1951, they held a card party to raise $1000 for local charities.

The Boys in the Back Room

A young party worker was lamenting the results of a recent election. "It's bad enough to lose," he said, "but to lose to that bum is terrible."

"Son," his district leader said, "remember this: anybody who wins is never a bum!"

"Of course we'll win—if the other side don't bribe us."

On the Wall: Too many people who want to play the political game look with disdain upon the lowly precinct worker.

The public is apt to speak of politics as "dirty" because every day is washday.

"We would all like to vote for the best man—but he's never a candidate."

Under the Table: "Zero division"—a division of any ward which is so completely under the control of one party that no votes for the opposition are cast in an election. In one city "zero divisions" became so common that word went down to neighborhood leaders: "Have somebody vote for the opposition. No more zero divisions. It don't look good."

Most people do not vote for policies or candidates but for "Joe, the Committeeman." He helps them the year around. Why should anyone be so ungrateful as to vote against him on election day?

In politics, money doesn't talk. It screams!

Voter's Notebook

It is always worth while to defeat a bad man running for re-election, even if his successor is just as bad. It is worth while hopping in behind the challenger and helping him throw the officeholder out. Then while the new man may also be a wrong one, he is your wrong one. If he is only wrong in his ideas, you may be able to influence him some, and so a little progress is made.

HOLIDAY EVENINGS AT HOME

One of the pleasantest things any woman can do (any night of the year) is to change into something long and feminine for evenings at home. Full skirts, soft slippers and pretty puffed sleeves are divinely comfortable and becoming. Slim black trousers have come in again. Quilted skirts are worn with jersey tops. Snow-white nylon is a midwinter fashion, as well as holly-red velvet.

... and fall in love with another ?

Our own young

Here are four kinds of parties, favorites of our young editors, who love to entertain, and pass on to you their recipe for success—an easy host and hostess who are having as much fun as their guests, because they've planned good food (including good coffee!);
with service worked out beforehand, and managed well.

Large party — on the smörgåsbord plan

"About once a month, Todd and I love to have all our friends in at once," says Polly Toland Cooke, "sometimes as many as twenty for a buffet dinner. I've found the most successful way to give large dinner parties is a buffet worked out on the smörgåsbord pattern—though not necessarily with smörgåsbord dishes." She plans two hot main dishes—like meat balls in tomato sauce, and cauliflower au gratin. She varies the number of salads according to the number of guests, suggests at least two hearties—coleslaw with crumbles of bacon, and a crab-aspic loaf. Dessert: Camembert, Gruyère and Edam cheeses with dark Swedish bread and fresh fruit.

MENU

Meat balls in tomato sauce ★
Cauliflower au gratin ★

Crab-aspic loaf ★—Tossed green salad

Cheese and fresh fruit

Easy party — do it all the day before

Nora and John Smith have adopted this menu for a really easy party and it's all prepared the day before. The noodle, ham and sour cream casserole usually waits in the refrigerator a day ahead. So does a pie plate containing the graham-cracker crust for the ice-cream pie. All Nora has to do at the last minute is heat her casserole and French bread, pop frozen peas into boiling water, and fill the pie shell with ice cream.

marrieds

Splurge party — serve barbecued chicken

Every now and then, most young marrieds want to give a party that goes all out for elegance, where expense is not the main concern. Barbecued chicken is a favorite of Betty and John Gray for this kind of party meal. Before the guests arrive, they set up card tables at one side of the living room, complete with linens, silver, flowers, water glasses, bread-and-butter plates with pats of butter. The dining table in their dining alcove becomes the buffet table, and guests file around and serve themselves.

Stuffed pickled-mushroom canapés ★
Barbecued chicken ★
Medley of Lima and string beans, peas
Tossed salad with avocado
Chocolate-mint roll ★

Budget party — make soup the main course

A hearty soup can be the mainstay of a wonderful party menu—whether your food budget for the month is running low or not! Betty and Bob Hoffman love to serve minestrone; Betty has found that it's not only delicious, but a wonderfully economical way to use up little bits of leftover vegetables and meat. The Hoffmans set up their buffet table with a big tureen of soup, and have soup bowls waiting on dinner plates (large, so the bowls won't slide off) for guests to serve themselves. Radishes, olives and crisp celery are ready on each plate for guests to munch on with the soup. Dessert is apple crisp, topped with whipped cream and coconut—perfect with a minestrone meal.

the Careful hearts

She put her heart away carefully where she thought

By BETTY KJELGAARD

THERE had been a thunderstorm at dusk. Now the earth lay wilted and fragrant and the savage downpour of water had become a gentle summer rain. Serena Benton drove through town and up the street to the house where John Dawson had boarded for the past four months. She tapped the horn twice, politely, and waited.

One more hour, she thought, and he will get on his plane for Chicago and I will stay here in Colorado and it will be over.

The front door of the house opened. John stood etched against the light glow, saying good-by to his landlady. His voice was deep and solid and familiar in the night, and the pain quickened in Serena. She fought it intelligently.

Look, my girl, it's only natural that you'll be wincing at memories for a while. You can't see a man for sixteen weeks as often as you've been seeing John, and not get a little sentimental about the way he laughs, or his haircut. But don't worry. He'll think about the way you laugh, and your haircut too.

"Hello, Serena," John said. He put his luggage in the back of the car and climbed in beside her. He slanted a look at her and grinned. "It's not often a guy can have a chauffeur like you to drive him to an airport."

"Anything for you," Serena said. "Anything at all."

She drove between the shining boles of trees to the business district, a wet tapestry in apricot and black. Near the end of the street a little sign blinked sadly as the rain fell on it like tears. The Tavern—nothing—The Tavern—nothing.

"Good-by, pizza," John said, saluting. "Good-by, Cooney."

"Don't forget the hump in the floor," Serena said.

"That's right. Good-by, hump in the floor."

The town's sparkle was behind them then and they were on the forty-mile stretch of open road that led to the airport and John's plane. Goo-ood-by, goo-ood-by, sang the windshield wipers. Serena watched the headlights bore yellow holes into the rain, sweep distorted shapes into clarity.

A raccoon, crouched under a mountain pink, waited for them to drive by, a deer browsing in a meadow flung up its head and regarded the car with bright lanterns for eyes.

John chuckled.

"Tell me, too," Serena said.

"Cooney and his piano and his crazy songs. Ode to a Heifer! Who but Cooney would unearth a thing like that?" (Continued on Page 158)

"MY brother and I decided when we were in high school that we wanted to be more than a couple of 'nothings,'" says Eugene Jones, half of the team of twenty-six-year-old twin photographers whose assignments for a TV network took them from Korean battle fronts to top European capitals last year. "We couldn't go out and play pioneer because there were no more frontiers left to conquer. So we decided to 'shake dice with the devil,' playing with the most precious commodity—our lives."

For Eugene and Charles Jones, "shaking dice with the devil" has meant almost ten years of crack newspaper and TV photographing, beginning as sixteen-year-old staff cameramen in Washington, D. C., their home town. After finishing their eleven-to-three shifts on their papers each night, the twins cruised the streets of Washington in their car, equipped with police- and fire-department radios, looking for news in the making. "We were scared silly we'd get beat on a story," explained Charles.

They got their biggest assignment early this year, when they filmed interviews with the heads of ten European and Near East governments and won an exclusive interview with Robert Vogeler after his release from communist prison.

The twins were in Paris when they heard that Robert Vogeler was to be released from a communist prison. Within a few hours they were on a plane for Vienna, where Vogeler, his nerves shattered by his prison ordeal, was in seclusion. His wife had advised the press that her husband was not to be disturbed and the other photographers and reporters had retired. Undaunted, the twins bribed a guard to take a message to Mrs. Vogeler, enclosing a picture of themselves with President Truman (taken when the President awarded prizes to White House photographers) and hinting strongly, and without foundation, that they had been chosen to "represent the press of the whole world." The Joneses were promised three minutes with the distraught businessman; they got more than half an hour.

"He couldn't talk at first," reports Eugene Jones, "but one of us sat near him and patted his knee and told him it must have been terrible, and the other stayed with the camera. Finally he started to talk, and then he broke down and blubbered a little. Nobody had photographed his reunion with his family, so we told his wife it must have been a long time since he'd been kissed. She got all emotional and threw her arms around him, and then we got his kids to say it was good to have him home. It made good pictures."

The Jones twins: no frontiers to conquer, they "shake dice with the devil."

Asked how they felt about witnessing Vogeler's breakdown and emotional chaos, the slight, sharp-faced twins just shrugged. "It was just like covering a fire."

"TO relax," said Marian Anderson, "I simply take my portable sewing machine with me whenever I travel, and I do a great deal of sewing on my trips. My last big sewing job was to make drapes for all the windows of the guesthouse of my home. I used to make dancing dresses and evening dresses and I'd like to tackle a suit, but I don't quite trust myself with the shoulders."

We noticed that she seemed to be looking at us curiously every few moments, as if she had something on her mind. "And did you make the suit you have on?" asked Miss Anderson, her great dark eyes a little shy. "I have been admiring it since you came in and I was wondering if I might borrow the pattern."

"Now I am beeg business. Ten years ago I was considered a faddist, but now I am beeg business. It is quite a gratifying thing. I have the whole world eating wheat germ. I think I have become successful because no one has really helped middle-aged people until I became interested in them.

"I meet the famous people of the world and become their confidant. I love my associations with fascinating people."

Since many of his relatives live in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, just ninety miles from Chicago, we asked Doctor Hauser what they thought of his fame and startling success.

"You know, Miss Daly," he said with the same elegance and a quiet shrug, "relatives are always the last to take one seriously."

COLUMNIST John Crosby pounds a tough typewriter in his criticism of radio and TV. For his critical comments, Sherman Billingsley has barred him from the Stork Club, Ed Sullivan sent a letter saying, "At least I never tried to deprive a man of his livelihood." But more often Crosby's mail is flooded with letters from worried parents who ask, "What should I do about my children and television?"

"We have a sort of form letter for parents," explained Mr. Crosby. "We suggest they try to work out a schedule with the children, allowing them to look at only a certain number of shows per day, leaving plenty of time for playing outdoors and more creative indoor play."

And what about television rules for his own children? Mr. Crosby's tone suddenly became less "form letter" and more firm: "Our two kids are too little to really know one show from another, but my four-year-old son likes to play around with his other toys—with the television set going full blast in the background. If we turn it off, he howls—you know how four-year-olds are. So we have only one rule in our house: If you're not going to sit still and watch the thing, turn it off!"

HUMPHREY BOGART, professional tough guy, sometimes gets tired of movie fans, autograph hunters and the fame and fuss of Hollywood. "That's why I like the French," he told a friend recently as they took a slow sight-seeing drive through Paris. "They're sophisticated people. They're used to celebrities and they have enough sense to leave a guy alone. I can do what I want, go where I want, here. In this town I could be just anybody." Then the car pulled up for a stop light. A middle-aged man stepped from the curb, stuck his hand—his forefinger pointing pistol-like—in Bogart's window and shouted, "Bang, bang." Without another word, he straightened his beret and quietly walked away.

Mother loved to cook

By

DE ZOUCHE

MOTHER believed in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians and the Apostles' Creed and the immortality of the soul, but she also believed in food. Food wasn't just something you fed your family to keep them alive and quiet. Not to mother. Food was an act of love, a triumph of beauty, and a proof of the good life here and now. Mother loved to cook. The trail of pans and mixing bowls and measuring cups across the kitchen would have appalled a lesser soul. Not mother. She beat and whipped and rolled and stirred with an ecstasy most women of her generation were pouring out on Browning.

The nickels mother paid me for washing dishes fast enough to keep one mixing bowl ahead of her paid my library fines and bought my hot-fudge sundaes; and though this wrecked my business habits and worked havoc on the enamel of my teeth, it gave me a sort of permanent moral advantage over both librarians and soda clerks. Mother never admitted that she didn't like to wash dishes. Instead, she explained that she didn't have time. You couldn't keep your mind on your cooking, mother pointed out, if you were constantly stopping to wash dishes. And the secret of good cooking, mother insisted, was to keep your mind on it. That, and not to skimp on the butter. If there was anyone mother abhorred, it was a woman who skimped her family on butter. Mother had never heard of vitamin A, but she knew that butter had it, and vitamin A called by any other name was just as sweet to mother.

For instance, said mother, if you want French toast to taste like French toast you have to fry it in butter. The reason most French toast tastes like bread pudding is that it's fried in something that isn't butter, or because it's dipped into something that isn't cream and egg—probably skim milk and egg, mother added with a shudder. Besides, most women were too lazy to blend the sugar with the cinnamon before they rolled the bread in it. If women could only realize the importance of blending! Of course if they wanted to skimp on butter and eggs and starve their families, it was none of her business, mother always admitted with a shrug, but you'd think they'd care something about the future of the race.

Then this business of frying apples. Nothing but butter would do for them either. Naturally if you just dumped a lot of odd-sized hunks of slashed-up apple into a skillet and plunked in some fat and sugar and cooked them at high heat, stirring them, you could hardly expect to come out with anything fit to put on a platter with sausage. The way to make fried apples a thing of beauty on a breakfast platter was to cut them carefully into eighths, roll them in sugar and salt (blended), place them in circles in the skillet so that they didn't touch, and fry them slowly to a golden brown in sizzling butter, turning them one by one with a fork. Yes, it took more time and was more trouble to cook them this way, mother admitted, but after all there simply are no short cuts to good cooking. Probably there would always be women who would stir fried apples, just as there would always be women who wouldn't bother to make French seams or crochet edging on their little girls' panties; but God, said mother reverently, had blessed her with more vision than this.

And it was no wonder people didn't like carrots, mother said. They were never decently cooked. People seemed to have no imagination where carrots were concerned. How could you expect a discerning little child to beg for carrots if you merely boiled them and slung them on a plate? No, carrots, after a quick cooking in a steam cooker, must be sliced into a saucepan of melted butter, a dash of sugar and a dash of salt added, and cooked down slowly until the butter had disappeared and the carrot disks were a golden brown. Then you had the real carrot flavor and your children had to be reminded not to gobble them.

Sweet potatoes were treated the same way. Boil them quickly, peel them, halve them, roll them in sugar and salt and cinnamon, and brown them long and slowly in butter which came up well to the edge of the skillet. Use plenty of sugar, said mother. Sugar is a food and necessary for energy. People without sufficient sugar in their diets were likely to let gates sag on their hinges and holes go unmended in their screens.

Yes, butter loomed large in our lives. Frequently mother churned her own, patting it into a cloverleaf mold and wrapping it in a sterile damp cloth. It was not only better than store butter, mother admitted modestly, but so much more artistic. It was butter, too, mother insisted, that made corncakes an aesthetic triumph; butter that made fried chicken something your guests talked about years afterward; and butter that produced cake which kept your husband a home-loving man. If women would only learn to use butter lavishly and save on other trifles, such as reversing the window shades and making over their husbands' trousers into skirts for their little girls, civilization would progress much more rapidly, mother was certain.

As to fried chicken, mother used to choke with indignation over the way people ruined it. You'd think anyone would know by instinct, said mother, how to cook it. It was mother's opinion that more human stomachs had (Continued on Page 111)

GOD HELP ME

By Eddie Cantor

"God help me" is muttered subconsciously, cried out in sudden agony or embellished in elaborate prayers in all the languages of the world. And that's as it should be. This is one place you can be sure of an audience.

In these days of suffering and confusion, the whole universe is praying, and it must keep God pretty busy. Wouldn't it be fine if we helped Him? Why not appoint yourself one of God's workers? Don't leave it all up to Him. Too many of us pray for more money, new jobs, better health, and relax with an attitude of "God, You take it from here." We ought to follow through on our prayers, do our part in making them come true.

In any school system in the world, there comes a day when the teacher no longer works out the problem, when it's up to the pupil to practice the theories he has learned. We accept that system. We can't wait for the time when we will be on our own, proud to show how much we've learned. Why do we offer less to God? Why, after learning His principles, are we so afraid to follow them? Why are we too lazy to decide which of His teachings apply in an everyday problem? Why do we so casually toss aside our responsibilities and cry out, "God help me"?

Our obligations also extend beyond helping ourselves. You have got to think of the other fellow. And once you start, you won't be able to stop. More potent than any drug is the thrill that comes when you've helped raise money for a nation in need, when you know that you had a part in making the difference between life and death for starving people, when you've seen a crippled child walk after treatment at a hospital to which you have contributed, when you've seen the expression in a man's eyes after you've been unexpectedly kind. Rich or poor, all of us have what it takes to help another—something that money can't buy: the power of kindness.

There is a tendency today to feel that our efforts are inconsequential in shaping the destiny of the world. As individuals, this is partially true, but actions and thoughts are contagious. When you act as God's emissary, those around you absorb some of your thinking and pass it on to others. Think of the potentialities of a world praying, in humility and sincerity, "God, let me help You," instead of "God help me."

Merry Christmas

by Ann Batchelder

WHATEVER happens in the world, nothing can prevent the season's rolling round; and when December comes, you just can't help getting that Christmas feeling—and who would resist it? It's part of the rounding out of the year—it's as full of memories and tradition and sentiment as a plum pudding is of raisins.

It seems to me not very wise to meddle with family traditions when the holidays are here. Whatever is the family custom, that is what it should be. You know how it is. Some people hold by roast goose and there are folks who go for roast pig; but up where I came from, as well as in numberless other places, they'd as soon forget the day of the month as not to have roast turkey for Christmas dinner. The fact of having disposed of one a while back, at Thanksgiving, doesn't make any difference. Turkey is their Christmas choice. Personally, I wouldn't have any other bird on that day. And that's about as far as my bigotry goes. I'm bigoted and set on that point. For it is a family tradition. Otherwise my mind is as wide open as a steamed clam. What could be fairer than that! Now let's get on with the turkey and such, and let me start out with the age-old wish—a Merry Christmas to each and all! And that means all.

STUART-FOWLER

Line a Day

By ANN BATCHELDER

1 To an already marvelous collection of cookbooks, dating from the eighteenth century to the day before yesterday, has been added, by way of a good friend's thoughtfulness, a unique volume called OPERATION VITTLES. It's a book of receipts made up by the wives of the occupation forces stationed in Germany. There many fine cooks of many nationalities seem to have gathered together, and OPERATION VITTLES is the result. One longs to try "Fast Apple," to take a flier with "Chicken Galabki," "Country Gentleman" and "Heaven-Knows-What Chicken," and scores more. We salute the good cooks in Germany.

2 Surprises come in many guises. Here's one in baking-powder biscuits. Make your biscuits as usual, adding a teaspoon or so of fine crushed dry or minced fresh sage or savory. Or add the herbs to softened butter for the biscuit spread. Serve hot with ham or pork. They're delicious and likely to make you famous.

3 A beef stew may cause thrills or chills, depending on the stew. A bucker-upper for such is a liberal supply of tiny potato balls fried to a crisp in deep fat and added last. Keep this in mind next stew day.

4 From neighbor Mexico we pick up some news on rice. It's rice flavored with saffron, and as it steams toward the end, tiny clams in the shell are put on top and steamed to open. So the juice runs into the rice and you pick out the clams with a pick. Nice idea, good eating.

5 "An omelet is to cooking what a sonnet is to poetry"—Alexandre Dumas. This great French novelist and dramatist was also a fine judge of food and something of a cook himself. Adding a tablespoon of cream to a plain omelet just before folding was an idea I borrowed from him and found worthy.

6 If you are not fond of boiled tongue, it may be the sauce that's at fault. Try a creole sauce of tomato catchup, adding cut tomatoes, green peppers, onions, pimiento and chopped green olives. Have everything very fine. It's a sauce you're making.

7 Now, to give a fish some reason to be proud, boil some little beets. Yes, beets; they go well with fish. Scoop them out, fill them with horse-radish sauce and the fish will give that garnish the eye before you can say "knife."

8 And about that horse-radish sauce. Add grated (well-drained) horse-radish to whipped cream and season it well. Goes lovely with the beets and is as good with cold meat as with fish.

9 And one more word about beets. With most any meat, you might try serving hot chopped beets mixed with chopped anchovies. Bet the anchovies are as astonished as you are, but the result is good.

10 For the appetizer tray, little shrimp need a dip. Here's one that's good for shrimp—also for raw cauliflower. Take ½ cup mayonnaise. Add 2 tablespoons lemon juice, a hint of curry and beat it up. Dip the shrimp. Here's a legitimate use for toothpicks.

11 Like hunting a coon in a cornfield is the search for something new and sophisticated for the hors d'oeuvre tray. Some folks spend all their waking hours dreaming up a fancy to mystify their guests. It's a lifework. Genius strives no harder to achieve a masterpiece. And success is its own reward.

12 One such, as simple as a slice of cold toast, is made by mixing equal parts of deviled ham with cream cheese; spread on potato chips and stick the chips together or leave them single and sprinkle with paprika.

13 French onion soup skips to Italy when it acquires a good bunch of cooked macaroni (or uncooked added the last twenty minutes to the soup pot). The soup can't function without Parmesan cheese. That makes it Italian-French, or vice versa. Good either way.

14 A red-hot baked potato, crackly outside and mealy inside, is awful good, and it smells as good as it looks and tastes. Broken open, with salt and pepper and butter tucked inside, even with hamburgers, you can't beat it.

15 But if you want to dress up a baked potato, try this. Split lengthwise and sprinkle with minced chives, dust with paprika and add little snips of pimiento. This is for the oh's and ah's.

16 With pimientos on my mind, I might as well add another suggestion. Chop up a couple of those big flat ones out of a can or jar and add them to your Sunday-night scrambled eggs.

17 A new one for me: whipped cream flavored with molasses and spiced with clove and cinnamon, served with gingerbread. That certainly had me tied until I ate it. It's great stuff. Believe me, great.

18 I don't want celery seed in everything, but I will admit that a little celery seed tossed in with a green salad is a thought and worth thinking about.

19 Know anyone who won't like vanilla ice cream doused with melted mint jelly or mint sirup and then covered with shaved chocolate or chocolate chips?

20 Eaten at a Williamsburg inn by one of our girls and reported good: apple juice, chilled to the bone, as they say, served with a scoop of orange sherbet plumped squarely in the glass.

21 Vanilla pudding, that molded custard-cup job that's a lazy thing but tastes all right, is like double talk, and how you fool 'em when you sprinkle it all over with tangerine or orange rind, delicately grated, as you know how.

22 An herb-flavored broiled chicken is something to remember and copy. Brush the chicken (split) with fragrant herb butter (rosemary is the thing) and broil, basting as you go, with the butter. Be careful—watch that no burn takes over.

23 Broiled or fried tomato slices sprinkled with fine basil are a wonder-working garnish for pork chops. Any tomato dish cries out for basil, as I've told you before. But don't forget it.

24 You can grow sweet basil and any number of other herbs in your kitchen windows. In pots. Water sparingly, but water. And ask the sun to help you. And the moon to lend its magic. They'll help.

25 Often you come across on a French menu this item: "Omelette aux fines herbes." Don't be scared. You can make it—a beautiful omelet seasoned with finely minced parsley, chives and chervil. Takes about a teaspoon of each for a six-egg omelet. It pays off in a big way. (Don't forget to add the cream.)

26 Talking about omelets, do one this way and repeat ad lib: Prepare your omelet as usual. Fry small slices of tomato very carefully. Sprinkle with basil, season. Fold in the center of the omelet when it's ready to fold. Serve hot, but hot.

27 I don't like sieved applesauce and that's that. But I do like baked applesauce made this way: Pare, core and quarter 6 medium-size apples. Put into a deep casserole. Add ¾ cup sugar and ½ cup water. Cover and bake very slowly until a rich color.

28 And most apple pies benefit, I find, by adding about a teaspoon of lemon juice and a touch of grated rind along with the spice (cinnamon for me).

29 If you find yourself left with a few canned peaches, apricots and pears, make a fruit-compote pie. Double crust or deep dish, it's even better than one fruit alone.

30 Recommended for a wintry day: Two parts creamy, seasoned mashed potatoes and one part finely shredded corned beef. Whip together until light and foamy. Put in a buttered baking dish, sprinkle grated cheese over the top and put in the oven to brown.

31 Now a Merry Christmas—it's an old wish but a true one and from my heart. God bless us every one.

HERE again is that happiest season of the year—and for Mother, the busiest! With all she has to do, one thing can't be neglected—good, hearty meals.

Now there's where maybe I can help. Why not let soup take over? Soup's nourishing, of course, and you have so many substantial main-dish soups to choose from. Soup's specially-appealing to appetites in winter: that's why December beats all months in soup eating. Soup's quick to serve, too—just four minutes from soup shelf to table—and it's so pleasantly easy on Christmas-strained budgets.

On this page are three delicious soups to plan meals around, and some menu suggestions. So—here's an easier and happier Merry Christmas-time to you!

A clever cook keeps a full soup shelf.

TOMATO SOUP Gets the Spotlight

THE ALCOHOLIC

Alcoholism is the abnormal and uncontrollable use of alcohol to an extent seriously detrimental to physical and mental health. This condition is now recognized as an important medical and public health problem.

The National Committee on Alcoholism estimates that there are about 65 million people in our count who drink alcoholic beverages t least occasionally. Only 4 million of them, however, have found that the use of alcohol constitutes a problem in their lives.

The National Committee also reports that about 750,000 of these users of alcohol have drunk uncontrollably to such an extent as to have seriously impaired their health. Physicians label this last group as true chronic alcoholics.

Fortunately, medical, health, welfare and religious agencies, industrial and other employers have taken a practical, realistic view toward alcoholism. This enlightened approach offers great hope to all chronic alcoholics—as well as to those who risk this condition.

1. What is the cause of alcoholism?

Authorities have found no one cause for this condition. Research shows, however, that alcoholics are usually people who do not seem able to face life in a mature manner because of some underlying mental or emotional condition which the alcoholic himself may not clearly recognize. They seem to seek escape by excessive drinking—and eventually they become dependent on alcohol just to go on living.

Some authorities also believe that an alcoholic's body chemistry differs from that of normal persons, and that this difference results in an unnatural appetite for alcohol. Excessive drinking, however, is in all cases a symptom. Often the symptom can be removed, but it is very apt to return unless the underlying trouble is eliminated.

2. How can medical science help the alcoholic?

Although there is no specific remedy for alcoholism, much can be done to help a person stop drinking completely. The success of any form of treatment, however, depends upon the alcoholic himself who must absolutely want to break the habit. Once he has stopped, most authorities agree that the real alcoholic cannot drink again with safety.

Psychotherapy may be used to help the patient recognize his problems and how to deal with them without the use of alcohol. Certain medicines, which should be used only under the guidance of a doctor, are also available. These medicines may help to wean the patient away from drink.

It is important, too, for the alcoholic to re-establish a routine of healthful living through proper diet, sufficient relaxation and sleep, and attention to other health measures that are usually disrupted by excessive drinking. In some cases, occupational guidance may be appropriate.

3. How can everyone help the alcoholic?

The general public—all of us—can help overcome the prejudices that have long existed about alcoholics by looking upon chronic drinkers as persons subject to serious physical and mental handicaps.

We must also help them to obtain the type of treatment that they need. This treatment may be individual or group therapy given by the doctor, or mutual aid through organizations such as Alcoholics Anonymous.

We can also support and encourage the development of programs for the scientific study and control of this problem. In these ways, we can all do our part toward restoring thousands of men and women to healthy, happy, useful lives. MY COUSIN RACHEL

"Ambrose was hiding behind the screen in the dining room, and watched you open up the pie. He told me he would never forget the look of amazement on your face when you lifted the crust and Don struggled out. You were ten years old, and it was the first of April."

She looked up from patting Don, and smiled at me; and to my great discomfiture I saw tears in her eyes, gone upon the instant.

"I owe you an apology for not coming down to dinner," she said. "You had made so much preparation, just for me, and must have come hurrying home long before you wanted. But I was very tired. I would have made a poor sort of companion. It seemed to me it would be easier for you if you dined alone."

I thought of how I had tramped about the estate from east to west so as to keep her waiting, and I said nothing.

"Seecombe told me how busy you were, and how much there is to do," she said. "You mustn't make any sort of alteration in your day tomorrow because of me. I just want to say one thing, which is thank you, Philip, for letting me come."

"It can't have been easy for you."

She rose then, and crossed over to the window to draw the curtains. Perhaps I should have drawn the curtains for her. I stood up, awkwardly, in an attempt to do so, but it was too late anyway. She came back beside the fire, and we both sat down again.

"It was such a strange feeling," she said, "driving through the park, and up to the house, and Seecombe standing by the door to welcome me. I've done it so many times, you know, in fancy. Everything was just as I had imagined it. Ambrose had described it all so well to me, from the entrance hall to every room in the house. He even sketched them for me, so that today, I well believe, I could find my way blindfold." She paused a moment. "It was perceptive of you, to let me have these rooms. They were the ones we meant to use, had we been together."

"I hope you'll be comfortable," I said. "Nobody seems to have been in here since somebody called Aunt Phoebe."

"Aunt Phoebe fell lovesick of a curate, and went away to Tonbridge to mend a broken heart," she said. "But the heart proved stubborn, and Aunt Phoebe took a chill that lasted twenty years. Did you ever hear the story?"

"No," I said, and glanced across at her, under my eyes. She was looking into the fire, smiling, I suppose, at the thought of Aunt Phoebe. Her hands were clasped on her lap in front of her. They were very slender, very narrow, like the hands of someone in a portrait painted by an old master, and left unfinished. "Well," I said, "what happened to Aunt Phoebe?"

"The chill left her, after twenty years, at sight of another curate. But by then Aunt Phoebe was five and forty. She married the second curate."

"Was the marriage a success?"

"No," said my Cousin Rachel. "She died on her wedding night—of shock."

She turned and looked at me, her mouth twitching, yet her eyes still solemn, and suddenly I had a vision of Ambrose telling the story, as he must have done, hunched in his chair, his shoulders shaking; with her looking up at him in just this way, concealing laughter. I could not help myself. I smiled at Cousin Rachel, and something happened to her eyes, and she smiled back at me.

"I think you made it up this instant," said, immediately regretting the smile.

"I did nothing of the sort," she said "Seecombe will know the story. Ask him."

I shook my head. "He would not think fitting. I forgot to ask you if he brought you anything for dinner."

"Yes. A cup of soup, a wing of chicken and a deviled kidney. All were excellent."

"You realize, of course, there are n women servants in the house? No one to loo after you, to hang your gowns, only youn John or Arthur to fill your bath?"

"I much prefer it. Women chatter so; an as to my gowns, all mourning is the same. have only brought this, and one other. have strong shoes for walking."

"If it rains like this tomorrow you wi have to stay indoors," I said. "There ar plenty of books in the library."

HER mouth twitched again, she looked a me gravely. "I could always polish th silver," she said. I could swear from he expression that she had guessed the array c relics came from a long-locked cupboard And that behind her large eyes she wa laughing at me.

I looked away. I had laughed with he once, I would not laugh with her again.

"At the villa," sh said, "when it was ver hot, we would sit out i a little court that there, with a fountai Ambrose would tell m to close my eyes, an listen to the wate making believe that was the rain falling a home. He had a grea theory, you know, tha I should shrink an shiver in the Englis climate. I was city-bred he said, and overcivi lized. Once I remembe I came down to dinne wearing a new gow and he told me I reeke of old Rome. 'You' freeze in that at home he said. 'It will be flan nel next the skin, and a woolen shawl.' haven't forgotten his advice. I bought th shawl."

I glanced up. Indeed she had one, blac like her dress, lying on the stool beside he

"In England," I said, "especially dow here, we lay great stress upon the weathe We have to, by the sea. The soil is poor, an with four days out of seven wet we're ver dependent on the sun when it does shine This will take off tomorrow, I dare say, an you'll get your walk."

"'Boy town, and Bawden's meadow," sh said, "Kemp's close, and Beef Park. Kilmoo and Beacon Field, the Twenty Acres, an the West Hills."

I looked at her, astonished. "You know the names of the Barton lands?" I said.

"Why, yes, I've known them by hear now for near two years," she answered.

I was silent. There seemed nothing I could say in answer.

Then, "It's rough walking for a woman, I told her gruffly.

"But I have strong shoes," she answered The foot she thrust out from beneath he gown was clad in a black velvet slipper.

"That?" I asked.

"Of course not, something larger."

I could not picture her tramping about th fields, however much she saw herself.

"Can you ride?" I asked her.

"No."

"Can you sit up on a horse if you were led?"

"I might do that," she answered, "but would have to hold on to the saddle with both hands. Isn't there something called a pommel on which one balances?" She pu the question with great earnestness, her eye

Is it true that life—even ordinary life—is limited and imprisoned by its handicaps? The very opposite is true. Every individual has the capacity for his own fulfillment. His handicaps, his deficiencies, his frustrations may be the very means by which he rises to creative levels. No man is entitled to sit back and declare himself defeated; he must weave from the circumstances of his life—from his abilities, his insufficiencies, his courage and his fears; from the strength of his joy and the ache of his pain—the pattern and texture of a life fulfilled. If he refuses, he and all life everywhere will be defrauded. A. POWELL DAVIES, D.D.: The Faith of an Unrepentant Liberal.

Mrs. Francis Irénée du Pont, II

... ALL THE WARMTH AND FRIENDLINESS
OF HER INNER SELF SPARKLE FROM HER FACE

You feel your heart being cajoled away the minute you see young Mrs. du Pont. Her face has such a radiant way of showing the underlying sympathy and bright warmth of her real Self. Your face, too, is telling your story wherever you go. Make very sure it reflects all the lovely magic that is really You.

Mrs. du Pont's complexion looks fresh-as-springtime, soft, glowing! "I'm never without my Pond's Cold Cream—it is the nicest cream you can buy anywhere," she says.

Don't keep her to yourself—that charming inner you —— let her show you to others in a happy new light!

COUNTLESS WOMEN keep their real selves shuttered up—when they could be outgoing and effective. Yet, no woman needs to be a "shut-in" self. You have an exciting inner power that can bring out a new, lovelier you.

This power grows out of the relation between your Outer Self and Inner Self—the way you look and feel. You come alive with confidence when you look your most charming. But—miss looking your best—and you feel uninteresting, drab! That's why it is unfair to you to neglect the daily details that add so to your outer loveliness, inner poise.

"Outside-Inside" Face Treatment

One of the instantly attracting things about you should always be your complexion. This treatment with Pond's Cold Cream has a noticeable way of making your face look soft and velvety—luminously clean. And, because it is cream cleansing, it can't be drying! Give your face this Pond's care always at bedtime (day cleansings, too). This is the way:

Hot Stimulation—give face a good splashing with hot water.

Cream Cleanse—swirl light, fluffy Pond's Cold Cream all over your face and throat to soften dirt and make-up, sweep them from pore openings. Tissue off.

Cream Rinse—do another soft Pond's creaming to rinse off last traces of dirt, leave skin immaculate. Tissue—lightly.

Cold Stimulation—give face a tonic cold water splash.

This face treatment works on both sides of your skin. From the Outside—Pond's Cold Cream cleanses and softens as you massage. From the Inside—every step of this treatment stimulates circulation.

Mrs. du Pont says: "I love the softness this Pond's treatment gives my face."

It's not vanity to develop the beauty of your face. When you look lovely, you gain a bonus in a new confidence that sparkles out from you to all who see you—brings others closer to the Inner You.

You hear it everywhere—
"She's Engaged! She's Lovely! She uses Pond's!"

solemn, yet I was certain there was laughter hidden there, and she wished to draw me.

"I'm not sure," I said stiffly, "if we have a lady's saddle. I'll ask Wellington. Do you think I should ask Seecombe to search the closets, and see if Aunt Phoebe left a riding habit?"

"I shan't need a habit," she said, "not if you lead me gently, and I just balance on that pommel."

At that moment Seecombe knocked upon the door, and entered, bearing in his hands a silver kettle upon a monstrous tray, likewise a silver teapot and a canister. I had never set eyes upon the things before.

"Tea is served, madam," said Seecombe.

And, "Thank you, Seecombe," she answered solemnly.

"What about breakfast, madam?" asked Seecombe. "Mr. Philip has his in the dining room at eight o'clock."

"I would like mine in my room," she said. "Mr. Ashley used to say no woman was fit to look upon before eleven. Will that give trouble?"

"Certainly not, madam."

"Then thank you, Seecombe, and good night."

"Good night, madam. Good night, sir. Come, dogs." He snapped his fingers; they followed him from the room reluctantly.

There was silence for a few moments, and then she said softly, "Would you like some tea? I understand it is a Cornish custom."

My dignity went. "I'll tell you something," I said. "I have never seen this tray before, nor the kettle, nor the teapot."

Cousin Rachel smiled. "I didn't think you had," she said. "I saw the look in your eyes when Seecombe brought them into the room."

"Is it really the thing to do?" I asked. "To drink tea after dinner?"

"Of course," she said, "in high society. When ladies are present."

"We never have it on Sundays, when the Kendalls and the Pascoes come to dinner."

"Perhaps Seecombe does not consider them high society," she said. "I'm very flattered. I like my tea. You can eat the bread and butter." This, too, was an innovation. Pieces of thin bread, rolled like small sausages.

"I'm surprised they knew how to do this in the kitchen," I said, swallowing them down. "They're very good."

She drank her tea. "If you want to smoke your pipe, you may."

I stared at her, surprised. "In a lady's boudoir? Seecombe will think it very wrong," I said. "He'll smell it in the morning."

"I'll open the window before I go to bed," she said. "It will all blow out, with the rain."

"The rain will come in and spoil the carpet," I said. "Then that will be worse than the smell of the pipe."

"It can be rubbed down with a cloth," she said. "How pernickety you are, like an old gentleman."

"I thought women minded about such things."

"They do, when they have nothing else to worry them," she said.

It struck me suddenly, as I smoked my pipe, sitting there in Aunt Phoebe's boudoir, that this was not at all the way I had intended to spend the evening. I had planned a few words of icy courtesy and an abrupt farewell, leaving the interloper dismissed.

I glanced at her with half-closed eyes. She put the cup and saucer back on the tray. Once again I was aware of her hands, narrow and small and very white.

She wore two rings, fine stones both of them, on her fingers, yet they seemed to clash in no way with her mourning, nor be out of keeping with her person. I was glad I had the bowl of my pipe to hold, and the stem to bite upon; it made me feel more like myself and less like a sleepwalker, muddled by a dream. There were things I should be doing, things I should be saying, and here I was sitting like a fool before the fire, unable to collect my thoughts or my impressions.

"If it's fine, then, tomorrow morning," she said, "will you really find a horse for me that will be steady and quiet, so I can sit up on him, and go and see the Barton acres?"

"Yes," I said, "if you want to go."

"I needn't bother you. Wellington shall lead me."

"No. I can take you. I have nothing else to do."

"Wait, though," she said. "You forget it will be Saturday. That's the morning you pay the wages. We'll wait till afternoon."

I looked down at her, nonplused. "Great heavens," I said, "how in the world do you know that I pay the wages Saturday?"

To my dismay, and great embarrassment, her eyes grew bright suddenly, and wet, as they had done earlier, when she talked of my tenth birthday. And her voice became much harder than before.

"If you don't know," she said, "you have less understanding than I thought. Stay here a moment; I have a present for you."

She opened the door, and passed into the blue bedroom opposite, and returned within a moment, carrying a stick in her hand.

"Here," she said, "take it, it's yours. Everything else you can sort out and see another time, but I wanted to give you this myself, tonight."

It was Ambrose's walking stick. The one he always used. The one with the gold band, and the dog's head carved in ivory.

"Thank you," I said awkwardly. "Thank you very much."

"Now go," she said, "please go, quickly." And she pushed me from the room, and shut the door.

I was down early the following morning, and immediately after breakfast walked across to the stables and summoned Wellington.

It is the melancholy face that gets stung by the bee.
—JAPANESE PROVERB.

"Mrs. Ashley cannot ride," I told him. "All she wants is something to sit upon, and to cling on to."

"We'd better put her up on Solomon," said the old coachman. Solomon had been hunted years back, but now took his ease chiefly in the meadow.

"What time does the mistress wish to start?"

"Sometime after noon," I said shortly. "You can bring Solomon to the front door. I shall be leading Mrs. Ashley myself."

Then I turned back to the estate room in the house, to check the accounts before the men came for their wages. The mistress indeed. Was that how they looked upon her? Wellington, and Seecombe, and the rest? I supposed in a sense it was natural, yet I thought how swiftly men, especially menservants, became fools when in the presence of a woman. I worked away at my accounts.

At noon the servants came, and the men who worked outside, in the stables, woods and gardens, and I gave them their money; then I noticed that Tamlyn, the head gardener, was not among them. I inquired the reason, and was told that he was somewhere about the grounds with "the mistress."

Some instinct told me where I should find Tamlyn and my Cousin Rachel. I was right. They were in the forcing ground, where we had brought on the camellias and the oleanders and the other young trees that Ambrose had brought back from his travels.

I had never been an expert—I had left that to Tamlyn—and now as I rounded the corner and came upon them, I could hear her talking about cuttings, and layers, and a north aspect, and the feeding of the soil, and Tamlyn listening to it all. She smiled at the sight of me and rose to her feet. She had been kneeling on a piece of sacking, examining the shoots of a young tree.

"I've been out since half past ten," she said. "I looked for you to ask permission, but could not find you, so I did a bold thing and went down myself to Tamlyn's cottage to make myself known to him. You see, Philip, I brought with me to Plymouth—I could not get them in the carriage, they will follow on by carrier—all the plants and shrubs that we had collected, Ambrose and I. I have the lists here with me, and where he wished them to go, and I thought it would save time if I talked over the list with Tamlyn. I may be gone when the carrier brings the load."

"That's all right," I said. "You both understand these things better than I do."

"We've finished, haven't we, Tamlyn?" she said. "And will you please thank Mrs. Tamlyn for that cup of tea she gave me, and tell her that I do so hope her sore throat will be better by this evening? Oil of eucalyptus is the remedy; I will send some down to her."

"Thank you, ma'am," said Tamlyn. "I've learned some things this morning, Mr. Philip, sir, that I never thought to learn from a lady. Mrs. Ashley knows more about gardening than I do, or ever will."

"Nonsense, Tamlyn," said my Cousin Rachel. "I only know about trees and shrubs. As to fruit, I haven't the least idea how to set about growing a peach; and remember, you haven't yet taken me round the walled garden. You shall do so tomorrow."

"Whenever you wish, ma'am," said Tamlyn, and she bade him good morning and we set back toward the house.

"If you have been out since after ten," I said to her, "you will want to rest now."

"Rest?" she said. "Who talks of resting? I have been looking forward to my ride all morning. Are you going to lead me, or shall Wellington?"

"No," I said, "I'll take you. And I warn you, you may be able to teach Tamlyn about camellias, but you won't be able to do the same with me and farming."

"I know oats from barley," she said. "Doesn't that impress you?"

"Not a jot," I said. "Anyway, you won't find either on the acres; they're all harvested."

When we came to the house I discovered that Seecombe had laid out a cold luncheon of meat and salad in the dining room, complete with pies and puddings as though we were to sit for dinner. My Cousin Rachel glanced at me, her face quite solemn, yet that look of laughter behind her eyes.

Whoever serves his country well has no need of ancestors.
—VOLTAIRE.

"You are a young man, and you have not finished growing," she said. "Eat, and be thankful. Put a piece of that pie in your pocket and I will ask you for it when we are on the West Hills. I am going upstairs now to dress myself suitably for riding."

At least, I thought to myself as I tucked into the cold meat with hearty appetite, she does not expect waiting upon or other niceties; she has a certain independence of spirit that would seem, thank the Lord, unfeminine. The only irritation was that my manner with her, which I hoped was cutting, she apparently took in good part and enjoyed. My sarcasm was misread as joviality.

I HAD scarcely finished eating when Solomon was brought round to the door. I went to tell Seecombe we would be out till after four, and when I returned my Cousin Rachel had come downstairs and was already mounted. Wellington was adjusting her stirrup. She had changed into another mourning gown, cut somewhat fuller than the other, and instead of a hat she had wound her black lace shawl about her hair for covering. For some reason I remembered what she had said the night before about Ambrose teasing her, how he had told her once that she reeked of old Rome.

I think I knew now what he meant. Her features were like those stamped on a Roman coin, definite, yet small; and now with that lace shawl wound about her hair she seemed more distant, more remote and more . . . Italian.

She heard my footstep, and turned toward me; and it went swiftly, the distant look, the foreign look. She looked now as she had before.

"Ready?" I said. "Or are you fearful of falling?"

"I put my trust in you and Solomon," she answered.

"Very well, then. Come on." And taking the bridle, I set off with her to tour the Barton acres.

The wind of the day before had blown itself upcountry, taking the rain with it, and since noon the sun had broken through and the sky was clear. There was a salty brightness in the air, lending a zest to walking, and you could hear the running swell of the sea as it broke upon the rocks fringing the bay.

Ours was a strange pilgrimage. We started off by visiting the Barton, and it was as much as I could do to prevent Billy Rowe and his wife from inviting us inside the farmhouse to sit down to cakes and cream; in fact, it was only by the promise of doing so on Monday that I got Solomon and my Cousin Rachel through the gates at all, up onto the stubble of the West Hills.

THE Barton lands form a peninsula, the Beacon Fields forming the farther end of it, and the sea running into bays, east and west, on either side. As I had told her, the corn had all been carried, and I could lead old Solomon wherever I pleased; he could do no damage on the stubble. The larger part of the Barton land is grazing land anyway, and to make a thorough tour of it all we kept close to the sea, and finally brought up by the beacon itself, so that looking back she could see the whole run of the estate, bounded on the western side by the great stretch of sandy bay and three miles to the eastward by the estuary.

Remembering her talk of the night before, I tried to test my Cousin Rachel on the names of the Barton fields, but could not fault her; she knew them all.

She did not throw her information at me; it was rather I, my curiosity piqued, who led her on to disclose it, and when she gave me the names, and spoke of the people, it was as a matter of course and with something of wonder that I should think it strange.

"What do you suppose we talked of, Ambrose and I?" she said to me at last. "His home was his passion, therefore I made it mine. Would you not expect a wife of yours to do the same?"

"Not possessing a wife, I cannot say. But I should have thought that since you have lived on the Continent all your life your interests would have been entirely different."

"So they were," she said, "until I met Ambrose."

"Except for gardens, I gather."

"Except for gardens," she agreed. "At the villa, when I was young and first married—I am not referring to Ambrose—I was not very happy, so I distracted myself by designing afresh the gardens there, replanting much of them, and terracing the walks; I sought advice, and shut myself up with books, and the results were very pleasing—at least I thought so, and was told so. I wonder what you would think of them."

I glanced up at her. Her profile was turned toward the sea, and she did not know that I was looking at her. What did she mean? Had not my godfather told her I had been to the villa? It struck me now that it was odd she had said nothing last night about my visit to Florence, odder still that she made no reference to the manner in which I had learned of Ambrose's death.

Could it be that my godfather shirked that issue, and left it to me to break it to her? I cursed him to myself for an old blunderer and a coward, and yet as I did so I knew that it was I myself who was the coward now. This was the moment to say, "I have seen the gardens at your Villa Sangalletti. Didn't you know?" But she made a coaxing sound to Solomon and he moved on. "Can we go past the mill, and up through the woods the other side?" she asked. I had lost my opportunity, and we went on back toward home.

Wellington was waiting at the house to help her dismount. She went upstairs to rest before she changed for dinner, and I sat down in the library, frowning and wondering how I was to tell her about Florence.

The worst of the business was that had my godfather told her of it in his letter it would have been for her to open the subject, and I to relax and wait for what she said. As things stood at present, the move must come from me.

I washed my hands, and changed my coat for dinner, and put into my pocket the two last letters Ambrose had written me, and when I went into the drawing room, expecting to see her seated there, the room was empty. Seecombe, passing that moment through the hall, told me that "Madam" had gone into the library.

Now that she no longer sat on Solomon, above me, and had taken off the head shawl, and had smoothed her hair, she seemed even smaller than before, and more defenseless. Paler, too, by candlelight, and her mourning gown darker in comparison.

"Do you mind my sitting here?" she said. "The drawing room is lovely in the daytime, but somehow now, at evening, with the curtains drawn and the candles lit, this room seems the best. Besides, it was where you and Ambrose always sat together."

Now perhaps was my chance. Now to say, "Yes, you have nothing like this at the villa." I was silent, and the dogs came in to make distraction. After dinner, I said to myself, after dinner is the time.

At dinner she admired the rose bowl and the candlesticks, and talked to Seecombe as he handled the courses. All the while I was in a sweat that he should say, "That happened, madam, or this occurred, when Mr. Philip was away in Italy."

I could hardly wait for dinner to be over, and for the pair of us to be alone again, though it brought me nearer to my task. We sat before the library fire, and she brought out some embroidery and began to work upon it.

"TELL me what it is that is bothering you," she said, after a while. "Don't deny there is anything, because I shall know you are not speaking the truth. Ambrose used to tell me I had an animal's instinct for trouble, and I sense it with you tonight. I have not said anything to hurt you, have I?"

Well, here it was. "You've said nothing to hurt me," I replied, "but a chance remark of yours confounded me a little. Could you tell me what Nick Kendall said in the letter he wrote to Plymouth?"

"Why, certainly," she said. "He thanked me for my letter, he told me that you both knew already the facts of Ambrose's death, that Signor Rainaldi had written to hin sending copies of the death certificate an other particulars, and that you invited m here for a short visit until my plans wer formed; indeed, he suggested that I shoul go on to Pelyn after leaving you. Which wa very kind of him."

"That was all he said?"

"Yes, it was quite a brief letter."

"I see." I felt myself grow hot, and sh went on sitting there so calm and still, work ing at the piece of embroidery. Then I saic "My godfather was correct in telling yo that he and the servants learned of Ambrose' death through Signor Rainaldi. But it wa not so for me. You see, I learned of it i Florence, at the villa, from your servants.

SHE lifted her head and looked at me, an this time there were no tears in her eyes, n hint of laughter either.

"You went to Florence?" she said. "When?

"I have been home a little under thre weeks. I spent one night in Florence onl The night of the fifteenth of August."

"The fifteenth of August?" I saw her eye flash back in memory. "But I had only le for Genoa the day before. It isn't possible.

"It's both possible and true."

The embroidery had fallen from her hand and that strange look, almost of stricke apprehension, came back into her eyes.

"Why didn't you tell me?" she sai "Why have you let me stay here in th house, four and twenty hours, and nev breathed a word of it? Last night—yo should have told me last night."

"I thought you knew. I had asked m godfather to write it in his letter."

"You went to the villa," she said, though talking to herself. "I want you tell me what happened, Philip."

I put my hand in my pocket. I felt th letters there. "I had not heard from Ambro in a long while," I said. "Then in July, th letter came. Unlike himself, a sort of scra I showed it to my godfather, Nick Kenda and he agreed that I should start at once f Florence, which I did within a day or tw As I left another letter came. I have bo these letters in my pocket now. Do you wa to see them?"

"Not just yet," she said, "afterward."

I shifted my gaze from her eyes down her hands. They were clasped in front of he

"But if I get you something you really want for Christmas it won't seem like a present."

Christmas for Johnny

Johnny has many gifts this year . . . but the one he values most can be seen only by its reflection in his face . . . and the faces of his family.
It will last a lifetime. It is the gift without which the others would be a harsh mockery . . . good health!
In a few months, Johnny will forget that he ever had empyema. Empyema! A word that used to make doctors shake their heads and talk of a long, long convalescence . . . if, indeed, full recovery was possible. Empyema meant that the lungs were badly damaged by infection, and prolonged disability was highly likely. Soon this serious lung infection will no longer be a menace . . . thanks to research!

Lederle research workers, in collaboration with hospital clinicians, have recently perfected a method for isolating and purifying enzymes that are manufactured by bacteria, which will dissolve and wash away blood clots and dead tissue substances, thus allowing the body's own defenses to clean up empyema and similar infections; and will allow antibiotics such as aureomycin to attack the invaders. This new material is VARIDASE*
Streptokinase-Streptodornase Lederle.
It has required intensive research and large expenditures for skilled personnel and intricate laboratory equipment for its production.
Only in a country where free enterprise brings to the people the rewards of initiative, skill and teamwork could such success have been achieved in a few short years.

Through research, they live who would have died!

small, and very still. It was easier to speak, somehow, if I did not look directly at her.

"I arrived in Florence," I said. "I hired a carrozza and drove to your villa. The servant told me Ambrose was dead, and you had gone away. He showed me the villa. I saw the room where he had died. Just before I left, the woman gave me Ambrose's hat. It was the only thing you had forgotten to take with you."

I paused. And went on looking at the hands. The right fingers were touching the ring on the left hand. I watched them tighten upon it.

"Go on," she said.

"The servant had given me the address of Signor Rainaldi. I called upon him. He gave me the particulars of Ambrose's illness and death. I inquired your whereabouts, but he professed not to know. The following day I started back on my journey home."

"Can I see the letters?" she said.

I took them from my pocket, and gave them to her. I looked back again at the fire, and I heard the crinkle of the paper as she opened up the letters.

There was a long silence.

She must have been reading them over and over. At last she gave them back to me.

"How you have hated me," she said.

I looked up, startled. Denial was no use. The barriers were down.

"Yes," I said.

"Why did you ask me here?" she said.

"To accuse you."

"Accuse me of what?"

"I'm not sure. Perhaps of breaking his heart. Which would be murder, wouldn't it? I wanted, more than anything in the world, to make you suffer. Then, I suppose, to let you go."

"That was generous. More generous than I should deserve. Still, you have been successful. You have got what you wanted."

Measure your health by your sympathy with morning and spring. —THOREAU.

Something was happening to the eyes that looked at me. The face was very white, and still; that did not change. Had I ground the face to powder with my heel, the eyes would have remained, with the tears that never ran down upon the cheeks, and never fell.

I rose from my chair and walked across the room. "It's no use," I said. "Please go upstairs, or anywhere but here. My mother died before I can remember, and I have never seen a woman cry." I opened the door for her. But she went on sitting there by the fire, she did not move.

I threw the two letters in the fire.

"That's no use either," she said, "when we both of us remember what he said."

"I can forget," I said, "if you will too. Nothing remains. Ashes don't count."

"If you were a little older," she said, "or your life had been different, if you were anyone but yourself, and had not loved him quite so much, I could talk to you about these letters, and about Ambrose. I won't though. If you will let me stay until Monday, I will go away after that, and you need never think about me again. Although you did not intend it to be so, last night and today were deeply happy. Bless you, Philip."

I STIRRED the fire with my foot, and the embers fell. "I don't condemn you. Nothing has worked out as I thought. I can't go on hating a woman who doesn't exist."

"But I do exist."

"You are not the woman I hated. There's no more to it than that."

"This woman," she said, "that you pictured in your mind. Did she take shape when you read the letters, or before?"

I thought about it for a moment.

"Before," I said slowly. "When he wrote and told me he was married. It must sound highly emotional and absurd to you, that I should have been jealous. Like a spoiled child. Perhaps that's what I was, and am. The trouble is that I have never known anyone or loved anyone in the world but Ambrose."

"Was not that his trouble too?" she said.

"How do you mean?"

Cupping her chin in her hands, her elbows on her knee, she stared into the fire. "You are only twenty-four, Philip," she said. "You have all your life before you, many years, probably, of happiness, married no doubt, with a wife you love, and children of your own. Your love for Ambrose will never grow less, but it will slip back into the place where it belongs. The love of any son for any father. It was not so for him. Marriage came too late."

I KNELT on one knee before the fire and lit my pipe. I did not think to ask permission. I knew she did not mind. "Why too late?"

"He was forty-three," she said, "when he came out to Florence just two years ago, and I saw him for the first time. You know how he looked; how he spoke; his ways, his smile. But you would not know the effect it had upon a woman whose life had not been happy, who had known men . . . very different."

I said nothing, but I think I understood.

"I don't know why he turned to me, but he did," she said. "Those things can never be explained. To me, lonely, anxious, and a survivor of too many emotional shipwrecks, he came almost as a savior, as an answer to prayer. To be strong as he was, and tender too—I had not met with that. It was a revelation. I know what he was to me. But I to him ——"

She paused and, drawing her brows together, frowned into the fire. "He was like someone sleeping who woke suddenly and found the world," she said, "all the beauty of it, and the sadness too. The hunger and the thirst. Everything he had never thought about or known was there before him, and magnified themselves into one person, who by chance, or fate—call it what you will—happened to be me. Rainaldi—whom he detested, by the way, as you probably did too—told me once that Ambrose had woken to me just as some men wake to religion. He became obsessed, in the same fashion. But a man who gets religion can go into a monastery and pray all day before Our Lady on an altar. She is made of plaster anyway, and does not change. Women are not so, Philip. Their moods vary with the days and nights, just as a man's can do. We are human, that is our failing."

"You mean," I said, "that he expected too much of you? He put you on a sort of pedestal?"

"No," she said. "I would have welcomed a pedestal, after my rough life."

She suddenly looked very tired. She leaned back in her chair and closed her eyes.

"Finding religion does not always improve a person," she said. "Waking to the world did not help Ambrose. His nature changed."

"How did his nature change?" I felt a queer sort of shock in my heart, like the shock that comes to you as a child when you suddenly learn of death, or of evil, or of cruelty.

"The doctors told me later that it was his illness," she said. "But I shall never be sure. Never be certain that it need have happened. Something in me brought out those qualities. Finding me was ecstasy to him for one brief moment, and then catastrophe. You were right to hate me. If he had not come to Italy he would have been living here with you now. He would not have died."

I felt ashamed, embarrassed. "He might have become ill just the same," I said. "Then I would have borne the brunt of it, not you."

She took her hands away from her face, and without moving looked across at me and smiled. "He loved you so much," she said. "You might have been his son, he was so proud of you. Always, 'My Philip would do this. My boy would do that.' Why, Philip, if you have been jealous of me these eighteen months, I think we are quits. I could have done with less of you at times."

She broke off, and smiled again at me.

"I would say that for this night I have talked to you enough," she said. She bent forward, and picked up the piece of embroidery that had fallen on the floor.

"I'm not tired," I said. "I could go on longer, much longer."

"We still have tomorrow," she said.

"Why only tomorrow?"

"Because I go on Monday. I came for the week end only. Your godfather, Nick Kendall, has invited me to Pelyn."

It seemed to me absurd, and altogether pointless, that she should shift her quarters quite so soon. "There's no need to go there," I said, "when you have only just arrived. Besides, there is the carrier coming from Plymouth, with all the plants and cuttings. And there are Ambrose's things to go through and sort."

"I thought you could do that by yourself," she said.

"Why," I said, "when we could do it both of us together?"

I stood up, and stretched my arms above my head. I kicked Don with my foot. "Wake up." I said. "It's time you went out with the others to the kennels." He stirred himself, and grunted. I glanced down at her, and she was looking up at me with such a strange expression in her eyes; almost as though she saw right through me, into someone else.

"What is it?" I asked.

"Nothing," she answered. "Can you find me a candle, Philip, and light me up to bed?"

"Very well," I said, "I'll take Don to his kennel afterward."

The candlesticks were waiting on the table by the door. She took hers, and I lighted the candle for her. It was dark in the hall, but above, on the landing, Seecombe had left a light to the farther corridor.

"That will do," she said. "I can find my way alone." She stood a moment on one step of the staircase, her face in shadow. One hand held the candlestick, the other held her dress. "You don't hate me any more?"

"No," I said, "I told you it was not you. It was another woman."

"Are you sure it was another woman?"

"Quite sure."

"Good night, then. And sleep well." She turned to go, but I put my hand on her arm and held her back.

"Wait," I said. "It's my turn to ask you a question."

"What is it, Philip?"

"Are you still jealous of me, or was that also some other man, and never me at all?"

She laughed, and gave me her hand. "That horrid boy, so spoiled and prim?" she said. "Why, he went yesterday, as soon as you walked into Aunt Phoebe's boudoir." Suddenly she bent, and kissed my cheek. "The first you have ever had," she said, "and if you don't like it, you can pretend I did not give it to you, but that it came from the other woman."

She walked up the stairs away from me, and the light of the moving candle threw a shadow, dark and distant, on the wall.

WE always carried out a strict routine upon a Sunday. Breakfast was later, at nine o'clock, and at a quarter past ten the carriage came to take Ambrose and myself to church. The servants followed in the wagonette. When church was over, the servants returned to eat their midday dinner, later we dined ourselves, with the vicar and Mrs. Pascoe, one or two of the unmarried daughters, and generally my godfather and Louise.

This Sunday, my Cousin Rachel descended to the hall upon the stroke of ten. A kind of ease had come upon me since the night before, and it seemed to me, as I looked upon her, that I could in the future say to her what I pleased. Nothing need hold me back. Neither anxiety, nor resentment, nor even common courtesy.

"A word of warning," I said, after I had wished her a good morning. "All eyes will be upon you in the church."

"You terrify me," she said. "I shall not go at all."

"That would be disgrace for which neither you nor I would be forgiven."

He that flies from his own family has far to travel.

—LATIN PROVERB.

The carriage came to the door. Wellington, with brushed hat and trim cockade, the groom beside him, was swollen with importance like a pouter pigeon. Seecombe stood at the front door with no less dignity.

I handed my Cousin Rachel into the carriage, and took my place beside her. She had a dark mantle around her shoulders, and the veil from her hat concealed her face.

"The people will want to see your face," I said to her.

"Then they must want," she answered.

"You don't understand," I said. "Nothing like this has happened for nearly thirty years. The old people remember my aunt, I suppose, and my mother, but for the younger ones there has never been a Mrs. Ashley come to church before."

"I WILL lift my veil in church, but not before," she said, "when I am kneeling. They can look then, if they have the mind, but by rights they should do no such thing. Their eyes should be on their prayer books."

"A high bench surrounds the pew, with curtains to it," I told her. "Once kneeling there, you will be concealed from view. You can even play marbles if you want to. I used to, as a child."

"You will behave yourself today, or I shall walk out of the church."

"Then everyone would think you had the vapors," I said, "and my godfather and Louise would come rushing to your assistance. Oh, great heaven ——" I broke off in consternation.

"What's the matter?"

"I've only just remembered. I promised to ride over yesterday to Pelyn to see Louise, and I forgot all about it."

"That," said my Cousin Rachel, "was not very gallant of you. I hope she snubs you well."

"I shall blame it upon you," I said, "which will be the truth. I shall say that you demanded to be taken all round the Barton properties."

"I would not have asked you to do so," she said, "had I known you were supposed to be elsewhere. Why did you not tell me?"

"Because I had forgotten all about it."

"If I were Louise," she said, "I would take that in bad part. You could not offer a woman a worse excuse."

"Louise isn't a woman," I said. "She's younger than myself, and I have known her since she ran around in petticoats."

"That's no answer. She has feelings just the same."

"Ah, well, she will get over them. She will sit next to me at dinner, and I shall tell her how well she arranged the flowers."

"What flowers?"

"The flowers in the house. She drove over especially to do them."

"How very thoughtful. She showed great delicacy and taste. I liked best of all the bowl on the mantelpiece in the boudoir, and the autumn crocus beside the window."

"Was there a bowl on the mantelpiece," I said, "and another by the window? I did not notice either. But I will compliment her, and hope she does not ask for a description."

I looked at her, and laughed; and I saw the eyes smile back at me under the veil, but she shook her head.

We had descended the steep hill and turned along the lane, and were now come to the village and the church. As I had thought, there was a gathering of people by the rails. I took off my hat, and offered my Cousin Rachel my arm. I had seen my godfather do this to Louise a score of times. We walked up the path to the church door, and the people stared at us.

I had expected to feel myself a fool, but it was quite otherwise. I felt confident and proud, and oddly pleased. I stared straight ahead of me, looking neither right nor left, and as we passed the men took their hats off to us, and the women curtsied.

We walked up the aisle past the Kendall pew to our own. As I stepped aside to let my Cousin Rachel enter the pew first, Louise glanced up, stared at my visitor, and then caught my eye. She raised her eyebrows in a question. I pretended not to see.

The congregation knelt in prayer. It was a queer sensation, having a woman in the pew beside me. She sat very still, her eyes fixed gravely upon the vicar, and when she knelt I noticed that she knelt full upon her knees, and did not sit half upon the seat as Ambrose and I were wont to do.

When we came to sing the hymns she put up her veil, and I saw her lips follow the words, but I did not hear her sing. She lowered the veil again and then we sat down to listen to the sermon.

I wondered who had been the last women to sit here in the Ashley pew. Aunt Phoebe, possibly, or Ambrose's mother, whom I had never seen. Perhaps my father had sat here, before he went away to fight the French and lose his life; and my own mother, young and delicate, who survived my father, Ambrose told me, a bare five months. I had never thought much about them. Now, looking at my Cousin Rachel, I wondered about my mother. Had she knelt there, on that footstool beside my father? I wondered, as Mr. Pascoe's voice droned on, what it had felt like as a child, being held in my mother's arms. Had she touched my hair and kissed my cheek and then, smiling, put me back into the cradle? I wished suddenly that I could remember her.

"And now to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost ——" The vicar's words brought me to my feet. I had not heard a word of his sermon. I had sat there dreaming, and watching my Cousin Rachel.

We went out of the church into the sun, and there waiting for us were a little crowd of people—tenants, acquaintances and friends, and among them Mrs. Pascoe, the vicar's wife, and her daughters, also my godfather and Louise. One by one they came up to be presented. My Cousin Rachel put up her veil, and I made a mental note to tease her about it when we were alone.

As we walked down the path to the waiting carriages she said to me before the others, "Philip, would you not like to conduct Miss Kendall in your carriage, and I will go with Mr. Kendall in his?"

"Why, certainly, if you prefer it," I said.

"That seems to me a very happy arrangement," she said, smiling at my godfather, who, bowing in his turn offered her his arm. There was nothing for it but to climb into the first one with Louise. I felt like a schoolboy who had been slapped. Wellington whipped up the horses and we were off.

"Look here, Louise, I'm sorry," I began at once. "It was quite impossible to get away yesterday afternoon after all. My Cousin Rachel wished to see the Barton acres, so I accompanied her. There was no time to let you know, or I would have sent the boy over with a note."

"Oh, don't apologize," she said. "I waited about two hours, but it did not matter. I guessed something of the sort had kept you. What happened? Have you really survived so far without a clash? Tell me all."

I tilted my hat over my eyes and folded my arms. "All?" I repeated. "What do you mean by 'all'?"

"Why, everything. What did you say to her, how did she take it? Did she show no sign of guilt at all?"

HER voice was low, and Wellington could not hear, but for all that I felt irritated.

"We've had little time for talking," I said. "The first evening she was tired, and went early to bed. Yesterday was taken up by talking about the place."

"Then you've had no serious discussion whatsoever?"

"It depends what you mean by 'serious,'" I answered. "All I know is that she is a very different sort of person from what I thought. You can see that for yourself."

Louise was silent. She did not lean back against the carriage seat as I did. She sat bolt upright, her hands in her muff.

"She's very beautiful," she said at last.

I took my legs down from the seat opposite, and turned to stare at her. "Beautiful?" I said. "My dear Louise, you must be mad."

"Oh, no, I'm not," replied Louise. "Ask my father, ask anyone."

"I've never heard such nonsense in my life," I said. "Perhaps she has fine eyes, but otherwise she is quite ordinary. The most ordinary person I have ever met. Why, I can say what I like to her, I can talk of anything. It is the easiest thing in the world merely to sit down in a chair in front of her and light my pipe."

"I THOUGHT you said you had no time to talk to her?"

"Don't quibble. Of course we talked at dinner, and out upon the acres. The point I wish to make is that it required no effort."

"Evidently."

"As to being beautiful—I shall have to tell her. She will laugh at that."

"Anyway, she seems to have made a great impression on you. Of course she is middle-aged. Quite thirty-five, I should say. Or do you think she is less?"

"I haven't the remotest idea, nor do I care," I told her. "She could be ninety-nine for all I know."

"Don't be ridiculous. Women don't have eyes like that at ninety-nine, nor that complexion. She dresses well. That gown was excellently cut, so was the mantle. Mourning certainly does not appear drab on her."

"Great heaven, Louise. I've never before heard such womanish sort of gossip from you."

"Nor I such enthusiasm from you, so it's tit for tat. What a change in forty-eight hours. Well, one person will be relieved, and that's my father. He feared bloodshed after you saw him last, and who shall blame him?"

I was thankful the long hill had come, so that I could get out of the carriage and walk up it, with the groom, to ease the horses.

What an extraordinary attitude for Louise to take. Instead of being relieved that my Cousin Rachel's visit was passing off so well, she seemed quite put out, almost angry. It seemed a poor way to show friendship.

When we came to the top of the hill I climbed in again and sat beside her, and we did not say a word to each other the whole way. It was quite ridiculous, but she made no attempt to break the silence, and neither would I. When we descended from our carriage, Louise and I stood by the door, and waited for my godfather and my Cousin Rachel. They were chattering like old friends.

"Did you have a pleasant drive?" inquired my Cousin Rachel, searching my eyes. I could swear she knew from our stiff faces how the drive had been.

"Thank you, yes," said Louise, standing back, allowing her to pass first, in courtesy; but my Cousin Rachel took her arm and said, "Come with me to my room, and take off your coat and hat. I want to thank you for the lovely flowers."

My godfather and I had barely had time to wash our hands and exchange greetings before the entire family of Pascoe were upon us, and it devolved upon me to escort the vicar and his daughters round the gardens. The daughters were loud in praise of my Cousin Rachel, and like Louise, professed to find her beautiful. It delighted me to tell them that I found her small, and entirely unremarkable, and they uttered little squeals of protestation.

"Not unremarkable," said Mr. Pascoe, "certainly not unremarkable. Nor would I say, as the girls do, beautiful. But feminine. That is the word. Most decidedly feminine."

"But father," said one of the daughters, "surely you would not expect Mrs. Ashley to be anything else?"

"My dear," said the vicar, "you would be surprised how many women lack that very quality."

We returned to the house, and entered the drawing room.

Not since Ambrose had been home had I ever known a Sunday pass as swiftly. Dinner, when it was served, with the meats upon the table, and the silver polished, seemed to spread itself before us like a banquet. I sat at the head of the table, where Ambrose had always sat, and my Cousin Rachel at the farther end. The entire Pascoe family blossomed like the rose, and I had never seen my godfather enjoy himself so much. Only Louise seemed silent, and withdrawn.

I did my best with her, but she did not, or would not, respond. Well, if she wanted to sulk, then sulk she must.

When we had finished dessert, and the port was put upon the table, I did not know whether I should rise, as I usually did, to open the door, or if, now I had a hostess opposite me, it would be her place to give some signal. There was a pause in conversation. Suddenly she looked at me and smiled. I smiled back at her in answer. We seemed to hold each other for a moment. It was queer, strange. The feeling went right through me, never before known.

Then my godfather remarked in his gruff, deep voice, "Tell me, Mrs. Ashley, does not Philip remind you very much of Ambrose?"

There was a moment's silence. She put down her napkin on the table. "So much so," she said, "that I have wondered, sitting here at dinner, if there is any difference."

She rose to her feet, the other women too, and I went across the dining room and opened the door. But when they were gone, and I had returned to my chair, the feeling was with me still.

Mud thrown is ground lost.
—PROVERB.

They all went off at about six o'clock. I heard Mrs. Pascoe engage my Cousin Rachel to pass an afternoon with her during the week; each of the Pascoe daughters pressed her claim upon her. One wanted advice upon a water color, another had a set of covers to be worked in tapestry and could not decide upon the wools, a third always read aloud to a sick woman in the village every Thursday—could my Cousin Rachel possibly accompany her, the poor soul had such a wish to see her.

"Indeed," said Mrs. Pascoe, as we advanced through the hall to the front door, "there are so many people who desire to make your acquaintance, Mrs. Ashley, that I think you can reckon upon engagements every afternoon for the next four weeks."

"She can do that very well from Pelyn," said my godfather. "And I rather believe we are to have the pleasure of her company within a day or two." He glanced at me, and I made haste to squash the idea before further entanglement was possible.

"Not so, sir," I said. "My Cousin Rachel remains here for the present. Before she becomes involved in any outside invitations she has the whole of the estate to visit."

I SAW Louise look at me wide-eyed, but I took no notice.

"Oh, well, yes, of course," said my godfather, in his turn surprised, "very right, very proper. I would have suggested conducting Mrs. Ashley myself, but if you are prepared to do so, that is quite another matter."

"We have a guest room at the vicarage," said Mrs. Pascoe. "If at any time you should be lonely, Mrs. Ashley, always remember it is at your disposal. We should be so happy to have you with us."

"You are all very kind," said my Cousin Rachel. "When I have done my duty here, on the estate, we will talk about it again, shall we? Meanwhile, believe me grateful."

There was much clatter and chatter, and saying of good-by, and the carriages drove away down the drive.

We went back into the drawing room. The evening had passed pleasantly enough, heaven knows, but I was glad that they had gone, and the house was silent once again.

She must have had the same thought, for as she stood a moment, looking around her in the drawing room, she said, "I love the stillness of a room after a party. The chairs are moved, the cushions disarranged, everything is there to show that people enjoyed themselves; and one comes back to the empty room happy that it's over, happy to relax and say 'Now we are alone again.' Ambrose used to say to me in Florence that it was worth the tedium of visitors to experience the pleasure of their going. He was so right."

I WATCHED her as she smoothed the covering of a chair, and touched a cushion.

"You don't have to do that," I told her. "Seecombe and John will see to it tomorrow."

"A woman's instinct," she said to me. "Don't look at me; sit down and fill your pipe. Have you enjoyed yourself?"

"I have." I lay sideways, sprawling on a stool. "I don't know why," I added. "Usually I find Sundays a great bore. It's because I'm not a conversationalist. All I had to do today was to sit back in my chair and let you do the talking for me."

"That is where a woman can be useful," she said. "It is part of their training. Instinct warns them what to do if conversation lags."

"Yes, but you don't make it obvious," I said. "Mrs. Pascoe is very different. She goes on and on until one wants to scream. No man ever gets a chance to talk on other Sundays. I can't think what it is you did to make it all so pleasant."

"So it was pleasant?"

"Why, yes, I've told you so."

"Then you had better hurry up and marry your Louise, and have a real hostess, not just a bird of passage."

I sat up on the stool, and stared at her. "Don't be absurd," I told her. "I don't want to marry anyone. And she isn't 'my' Louise."

"Oh?" said my Cousin Rachel. "I rather thought she was. At least, your godfather gave me that impression."

She sat down on one of the chairs, and took up her embroidery. Just then young John came in to draw the curtains, so I was silent. I was fuming, though. By what right did my godfather make such an assumption? I waited until John had gone.

"What did my godfather say?" I asked.

"I don't remember, specifically," she said. "I just think he felt it was an understood thing. He said Louise understood you very well, or you did her. I hope you apologized."

"I did," I said, "but it did not seem to make much difference. I have never known Louise in so vile a humor. It's all nonsense about Louise, anyway, so please forget it. I have never considered her as a wife, and don't intend to."

"Poor Louise."

"Cousin Rachel, will you be quiet?"

She looked up at me again, and smiled.

"And another thing you can be quiet about is this nonsense of visiting everybody," I said, "staying at the vicarage, staying at Pelyn. What is wrong with this house, and with my company?"

"Nothing, as yet."

"Well, then, tomorrow I shall draw up a list of tenants, in order of seniority. The ones who have served the family longest will be the first to be visited. We will set forth at two o'clock every afternoon until there is not a single individual on the estate that you have not met."

"Yes, Philip."

"You will have to write a note of explanation to Mrs. Pascoe and those girls, explaining you are otherwise engaged."

"I will do so tomorrow morning."

"When we have finished with our own people, you will have to stay in the house three afternoons a week—I believe it is Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays—in case you are called upon by the County."

"And do I sit alone here in the drawing room, or do you sit with me, Philip?"

"You sit alone. They will call upon you, not me. Receiving the County is not part of a man's work."

"Supposing I am invited out to dinner, may I accept?"

"You will not be invited. You are in mourning. If there is any question of entertaining, we shall do it here. But never more than two couples at a time."

"Is that etiquette in this part of the world?" she asked.

"Etiquette be blowed. Ambrose and I never followed etiquette, we made our own."

I saw her bend her head lower over her work, and I had a shrewd suspicion it was to hide laughter, though what she was laughing at I could not say. I was not trying to be funny.

"I suppose," she said after a moment, "you would not care to draw up for me a little list of rules? A code of conduct? I could study them here, while I am waiting to be called upon. It would be very unfortunate if I made some social faux pas, according to your lights, and so disgraced myself."

"You can say what you please, to whom you please," I said. "All I ask is that you say it here, in the drawing room. Never allow anyone to enter the library."

"Why? What will be happening in the library?"

"I shall be sitting there. With my feet up on the mantel."

"On Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays?"

"Not on Thursdays. On Thursdays I go into town to the bank."

She held her skeins of silk closer to the candlesticks to examine the color, and then folded them, and wrapped them in her work. She rolled the work into a bundle, and put it aside.

"And when the County have finished calling upon me," she said, "what happens?"

"Why, then, you are obliged to return their calls, every single one of them. I will order the carriage for two o'clock every Tuesday, Thursday and Friday."

"And I go alone?"

"You go alone."

"And what do I have to do on Mondays and on Wednesdays?"

"On Mondays and on Wednesdays, let me see." I considered rapidly. "Do you sketch at all, or sing? Like the Miss Pascoes? You could practice singing on Mondays, and draw or paint Wednesdays."

"I neither sketch nor sing," said my Cousin Rachel, "and I am afraid you are drawing up for me a program of leisure for which I am entirely unsuited. If, instead of waiting for the County to call upon me, I called upon them for the purpose of giving them lessons in Italian, that would suit me much better."

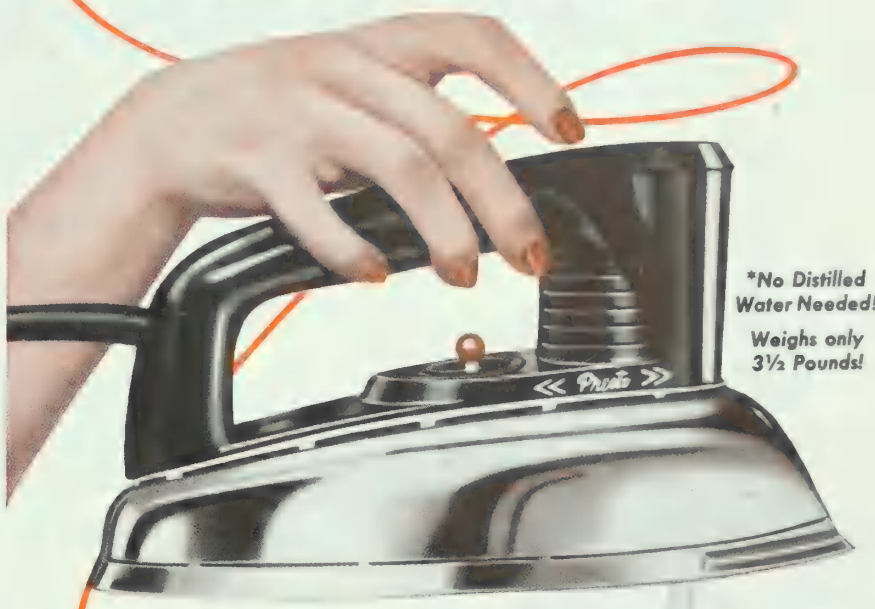
She rose to her feet, having snuffed the candles in the tall stand beside her. I stood up from my stool.

"Mrs. Ashley, give lessons in Italian?" I said in mock horror. "What a disgrace upon the name. Only spinsters give lessons, when they have no one to support them."

"And what do widows do who find themselves in similar circumstances?" she asked.

"Widows?" I said, not thinking. "Oh, widows marry again as fast as possible, or sell their rings."

"I see. Well, I intend doing neither. I prefer giving lessons in Italian." She patted me on the shoulder and left the room, calling good night over her shoulder.



I felt myself go scarlet. What had I said? I had fallen into the fun of conversation with her, and had let my tongue run away with me in consequence. Remarry. Sell her rings. What, in heaven's name, could she have thought of me? How blundering, how unfeeling, how altogether oafish and ill-bred I must have seemed.

I called Don, and letting myself out by the side door, I walked out in the grounds. As I walked it seemed to me that my offense grew worse instead of better. Coarse, unthinking, empty-headed lout. And what had she meant anyway? Was it possible that she had so little money that she was really serious in what she said? Mrs. Ashley give lessons in Italian? I remembered her letter to my godfather from Plymouth. That she planned, after a short rest, to go to London. I remem-

"Doctor,

The best man to answer this question is, of course, your family physician. We suggest that you ask him the next time you pay him a visit.

I'd like to know...

what is a NUTRITIONAL TIME BOMB?"

"Nutritional Time Bomb" is science's dramatic name for an equally dramatic discovery about diet . . . the discovery that injuries caused by mistakes in diet may not reveal themselves until years later.

Like actual time bombs, these injuries remain hidden and unrecognized, exploding into symptoms when it is too late to do anything about them. Thus, the dietary wrongs of childhood may be visited upon the adult.

Such scourges of later life as tooth decay, goiter, high blood pressure, heart disease, anemia and hardening of the arteries are not necessarily caused by present diet faults. They may be the delayed effects of earlier injury, where a dietary deficiency has existed too long.

A sound child body—the foundation of a sound adult body—must be built from the food that goes into it. The true effect of a mother's care during childhood has only begun to be understood. And, since eating habits are formed in childhood, the conscientious parent can do much to insure the child against later penalties of wrong eating.

The protective foods should be used generously in the daily diet. Important among these are bananas—long prescribed by doctors as one of the first solid foods for infants. Bananas have a well-rounded supply of vitamins and minerals, and are distinctly beneficent in their action upon the digestive tract. Because of the many appetizing ways in which bananas can be served, as well as because of their nutritional value, they are now being more widely used than ever.

bered what that man Rainaldi had said, that she was obliged to sell the villa in Florence. I remembered—or rather I realized, with the full force of its application—that in Ambrose's will he had left her nothing. Every penny of his property belonged to me. Something would have to be done about it, and I did not know what. I could not possibly discuss it with her. The very thought made me go scarlet again with embarrassment.

Then, with a sensation of relief, I suddenly remembered that the money and the property were not yet legally mine, and would not become so until my birthday in six months' time. Therefore, it was out of my hands. It was the responsibility of my godfather to approach my Cousin Rachel, and make some provision for her, out of the estate. I would go to see him about it at the first opportunity.

Feeling easier in mind, I came back to the house, but I still had not forgotten the original blunder. Remarry, sell the rings. I came to the edge of the grass by the east front, and whistled softly to Don, who was sniffing in the undergrowth. My footsteps crunched slightly on the gravel path. I heard a voice call down to me, "Do you often go walking in the woods at night?" It was my Cousin Rachel. She was sitting, without a light, at the open window of the blue bedroom. My blunder came upon me with full force, and I thanked heaven she could not see my face.

"At times," I said, "when I have something on my mind."

"Does that mean you have something on your mind tonight?"

"Why, yes," I answered. "I came to a serious conclusion walking in the woods."

"What was it?"

"I came to the conclusion that you were perfectly right to dislike the sound of me, before you saw me; and to consider me, as you did, conceited, pert and spoiled. I am all three. And worse than that besides."

She leaned forward, her arms upon the window sill. "Then walking in the woods is bad for you," she said, "and your conclusions very stupid."

"Cousin Rachel ——"

"Yes?"

But I did not know how to make my apology. I stood below her window, tongue-tied and ashamed. Suddenly I saw her turn, and stretch behind her, and then she leaned forward once again, and threw something at me from the window. I stooped to pick it up. It was one of the flowers from her bowl. An autumn crocus.

"Don't be so foolish, Philip, go to bed," she said.

She closed her window and drew the curtains; and somehow my shame went from me, and the blunder, too, and I felt light of heart.

IT WAS not possible to ride over to Pelyn the early part of the week, because of the program I had drawn up for visiting the tenants. Besides, I could hardly have made the excuse of seeing my godfather without taking my Cousin Rachel to call upon Louise.

On Thursday my opportunity arrived. The carrier came from Plymouth with all the shrubs and plants that she had brought with her from Italy, and as soon as Seecombe gave her the news of this—I was just finishing my breakfast at the time—then my Cousin Rachel was dressed and downstairs, her lace shawl wound about her head, prepared to go out into the garden. I went out to say good morning.

"I understood," I said, "that Ambrose told you no woman was fit to look upon before eleven. What are you doing downstairs at half past eight?"

"The carrier has come," she said, "and at half past eight on the last morning of September I am not a woman, I am a gardener. Tamlyn and I have work to do." She looked gay and happy as a child might do at the prospect of a treat.

"But this afternoon?" I protested. "Y were expected at Lankelly and at Coom The farm kitchens will be scrubbed, and prepared."

"You must send a note postponing t visit," she said. "I commit myself to nothi when there is planting to be done. Good-b And she waved her hand at me and pass through the front door on to the gravel dri

"Cousin Rachel?" I called at her from t dining-room window.

"What is it?" she said over her should

"Ambrose was wrong in what he said women," I shouted. "At half past eight the morning they look very well indeed."

"Ambrose was not referring to half p eight," she called back to me. "He was ref ring to half past six, and he did not me downstairs."

I TURNED back laughing into the dini room, and saw Seecombe standing at elbow, his lips pursed. He moved, with approval, to the sideboard.

One thing at least about this day of pla ing: I would not be wanted. I altered arrangements for the morning, and givi orders for Gypsy to be saddled, I was aw on the road to Pelyn by ten o'clock. I fou my godfather in his study, and I broach the subject of my visit.

"So you understand," I said to hi "something will have to be done, and ri away. Why, if it should reach Mrs. Pasc ears that Mrs. Ashley considers giving l sons in Italian, it would be about the cour in twenty-four hours."

My godfather, as I had expected, look most shocked and pained. "Oh, disgracefu he agreed. "The mat is a delicate one, of cour I must have time to th this out."

I became impatie "We have no time waste," I said. "You do know my Cousin Rac as well as I do. She is quite capable saying to one of the tenants in her easy w 'Do you know of anyone who would like learn Italian?' And where should we then?"

He looked thoughtful, and bit his p "That Italian adviser said nothing of l circumstances," he said. "We have no mea of knowing the extent of her private incon or what settlement was made upon her her previous marriage."

"I believe everything went to pay Sang letti's debts," I said. "I remember Ambr said as much in his letters to me. It was o of the reasons why they did not come ho last year, her financial affairs were so volved. No doubt that is why she has to that villa. Why, she may scarcely have penny to her name. We must do someth for her. And today."

My godfather sorted his papers spre upon the desk. "Well then, I will write letter to Mrs. Ashley, and to the bank will explain to her, and to the bank, wh the estate is prepared to do. The best p will be to pay a sum quarterly, from estate, into an account which I will op for her. Now, as to the sum of money ev quarter. What do you suggest?"

I thought a moment, and named a figu

"That is generous, Philip. Rather ov generous. She will hardly need as much that."

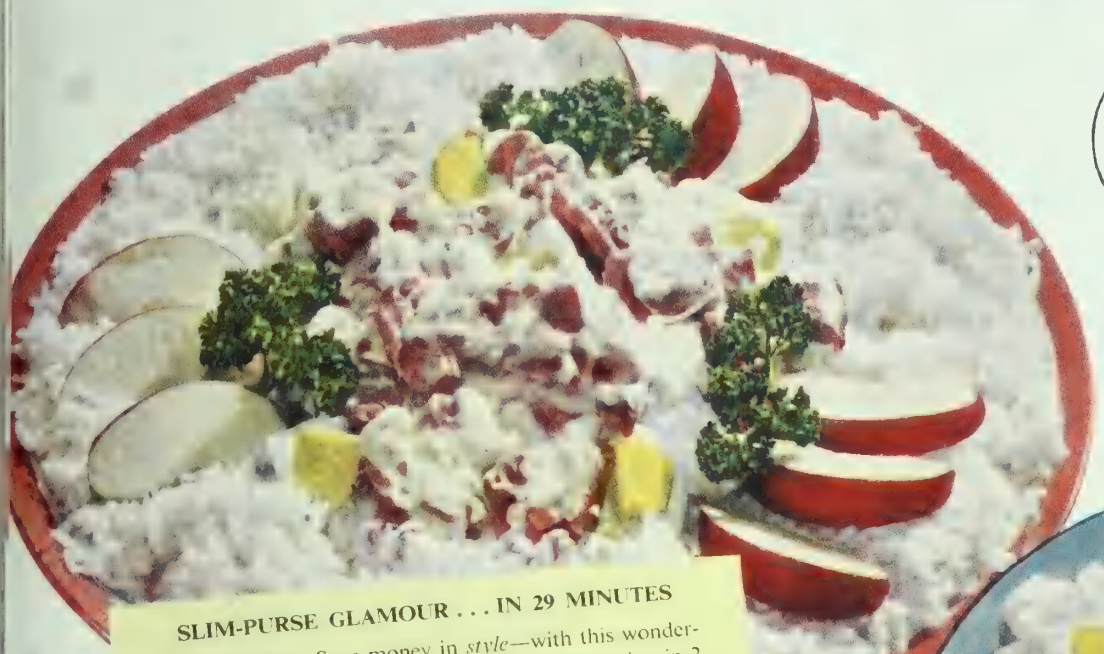
"Oh, don't let's be niggardly," I sa "Let us do it as Ambrose would have d it, or not at all."

"H'm-m," he said. He scribbled a fig or two on his blotter. "Well, she should very pleased by this."

"Hurry, sir," I said, "and write your l ter. Then I can take it back with me. I ride to the bank also, so that they have y letter."

"My dear fellow, Mrs. Ashley will hav be as pushed as that."

"I want it arranged," I said. "I want fixed, and done."



He sighed, and drew a sheet of paper fore him. "She was correct when she s you were like Ambrose."

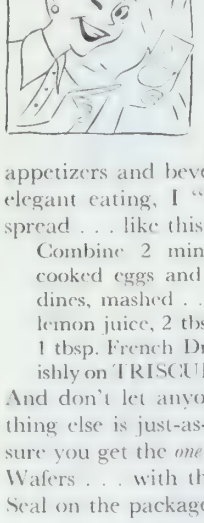
MINUTE BRAND RICE

A Product of General Foods

BUY-LINES • by Nancy Sasser

WHETHER you've a fine Bouncing Budget for Christmas shopping and entertaining or a shyly slim one doesn't matter in the least . . . if you're a wise and clever BUY-LINER. So give your careful attention to the inspirations listed below . . . all are quality-known by the famous names they bear! And don't miss my other BUY-LINES columns in your Sunday and weekday newspapers, The Saturday Evening Post and Good Housekeeping.



IT'S A TRADITION to serve turkey for Christmas dinner . . . and the manner of cooking is well prescribed. But why not make an extra-special stuffing . . . give it new taste appeal with mushrooms. I have a wonderful recipe for you, but first let me make a suggestion . . . use BinB Chopped Mushrooms. You see, BinB Mushrooms are the only freshly-picked mushrooms broiled in pure creamery butter . . . then packed in their own savory broth. And they save you so much time, work and money . . . for there's no peeling, no trimming and no waste. Now the recipe:

Heat 1 can BinB Chopped Mushrooms in 2 tbsp. butter. Add 3 cups dry bread crumbs, 1 tsp. grated onion, 1 tbsp. finely minced parsley, 1 tsp. salt, ½ tsp. celery salt, ⅛ tsp. pepper. Add sufficient hot water or stock to moisten, about ½ cup. Makes 4 cups.

And, if I were you, I'd keep BinB Whole Mushroom Crowns and BinB Sliced Mushrooms on hand, too . . . because they also have a "talent" for turning all kinds of inexpensive dishes into elegant party treats.

AND DON'T BE CAUGHT NAPPING when friends drop in during this festive season . . . expect these unexpected guests by keeping plenty of TRISCUIT Shredded Whole Wheat Wafers on hand. They're sure to make a hit . . . because everybody loves their just-right-for-crunching texture and hearty, tangy whole wheat taste.

TRISCUIT Wafers are salted to a "turn", too . . . then toasted to crisp, golden perfection. That's why they go so perfectly with all kinds of refreshments . . . everything from soups, salads and meats to appetizers and beverages. But, for really elegant eating, I "crown" them with a spread . . . like this one, for instance:

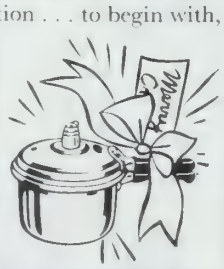
Combine 2 minced, shelled hard-cooked eggs and one 4-oz. can sardines, mashed . . . then add 1 tbsp. lemon juice, 2 tbsp. mayonnaise and 1 tbsp. French Dressing. Spread lavishly on TRISCUIT Wafers and serve.

And don't let anyone tell you that anything else is just-as-good . . . it isn't. Be sure you get the one and only TRISCUIT Wafers . . . with the big red NABISCO Seal on the package.

SANTA HAS A GIFT for you, too . . . a wonderful FREE recipe booklet called "BORDEN'S Eagle Brand Magic Recipes". Contains 70 of the most heavenly treats you ever tasted . . . including:

Pies that will open your eyes . . . jiffy homemade puddings . . . frostings that never fail . . . sauces with velvety smoothness . . . delicious desserts that are different . . . cookies that almost make themselves . . . failureproof candies . . . the best ice cream you ever put a spoon into . . . and many others.

They're truly the most luscious delights this side of paradise . . . yet are quick, easy and economical . . . some even require no cooking. Their secret of goodness is that "magic" all-purpose ingredient . . . BORDEN'S Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk! It's nourishing whole milk and sugar, already blended for you to creamy-smooth perfection . . . saves you time while it makes your sweet-to-eat treats richer and more delicious! So write for your FREE Recipe Booklet today . . . addressing Nancy Sasser, Dept. J2, 271 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y.



KNOW WHAT ELSE I'D DO? Whisper in Santa's ear that you'd like a GENERAL ELECTRIC Triple-Whip Mixer for Christmas . . . for it will not only make your mixing tasks easier, but reward with creamier, smoother results. The dust never gathers on mine . . . in fact, it's such a big help, I use it morning, noon and night. But note I said a G-E Triple-Whip Mixer . . . because:

It has a new, improved speed selector up in front which you can see to get the just-right power for every job . . . without squinting or guessing. And it has 3 beaters for more thorough mixing . . . they're easy to clean since there're no troublesome center shafts to get in your way. The built-in light shines directly into the bowl . . . spotlighting those fancy whipping jobs! And a 2-quart and 4-quart bowl, plus a super juicer, come with every mixer.

So ask for a G-E Triple-Whip Mixer for Christmas . . . and write Nancy Sasser, Dept. S10, 271 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y. for a FREE Recipe Booklet with 56 quick, easy, taste-tempting treats.

FOR THE FRIENDS you like best, I suggest a gift of lasting pleasure . . . a PRESTO Cooker. It's truly one of the best of all kitchen helpers . . . promising holiday cheer 3 times a day, every day of the year. That's no exaggeration . . . to begin with, a PRESTO Cooker can give up to 300 extra hours of kitchen freedom in a single year . . . because it cooks 3 to 4 times faster than ordinary, old-fashioned methods.

It gives doubly-delicious, extra-nutritious meals, too . . . for it seals in health-giving natural vitamins, minerals and natural food flavors. And last, but not least, only a PRESTO Cooker has the Pressure-Tru Indicator . . . which is why a PRESTO Cooker is so easy, so sure, so safe to use. But why go on . . . I'm sure you already agree that a PRESTO Cooker is a wonderful gift for any homemaker (old or new!) . . . including yourself! So visit your favorite Housewares Store and make your selections right away. PRESTO Cookers are priced from $12.95.

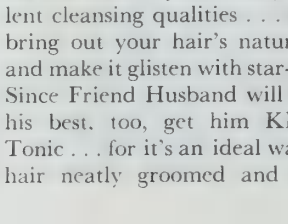
AND LUCKY YOU if Santa brings you a wondrous new GENERAL ELECTRIC Automatic Toaster at stocking-hanging time . . . for this sleek beauty will make toast to your taste for a long and happy lifetime. The toaster does the work. Just put the bread in, set the control to dark, light or in-between and forget it . . . a G-E Automatic Toaster will serve the toast just the way you want it. What's more, it will pop the toast up or keep it down . . . until you, the family and the breakfast are ready. Its new, exclusive Snap-in Tray is something to sing about, too . . . because it's such a "breeze" to clean! You simply snap the tray out, brush the crumbs off and snap back in again . . . that's all there is to it. Sounds wonderful? The new G-E Automatic Toaster is more than that . . . but I can't begin to tell you all about it. And besides . . . only seeing is believing. So make a date with your "Mr. Who" . . . take him with you to visit your G-E Appliance Dealer right away.

TO FINISH UP MY LIST of gift ideas, let me remind you . . . any homemaker (present or future!) would love to get some LADY PEPPERELL Form Fit Sheets. They're always needed, always welcome and always your best "buy-line" . . . for they not only have the traditionally fine quality, exquisite texture and long "life" of all LADY PEPPERELLS, but also all the advantages of the new fitted sheets. And you know what a wonderful boon to bed-making they are . . . how their mitred corners slip over the mattress and hold the sheet firmly in place without having to be tucked in and smoothed each morning. And . . . these wrinkle-free sheets fit so smoothly, they need no ironing! But, with all these "extras", LADY PEPPERELL Form Fit Sheets cost no more than regular sheets! Come in sizes to fit standard single and double mattresses . . . in both 140 count LADY PEPPERELL Superfine Muslins and 180 count LADY PEPPERELL Combed Percales. P. S. Get some for yourself, too.

NOW that I have a baby of my own, I know how deeply you mothers feel about your babies . . . how sure you want to be in the smallest things that affect your baby's well-being. Take cotton tips, for example . . . when you consider the very delicate nature of their use, only the very finest will do. That's why I use nothing less than JOHNSON'S COTTON TIPS . . .

AN ADVERTISING PAGE

for no one else in the world has such experience and skill in making baby products. Result? JOHNSON'S COTTON TIPS are baby-soft and baby-gentle . . . especially designed for baby's special needs. And look at some of their other advantages . . . they're made of the world's finest quality absorbent cotton and are sterilized right in the box. The cotton is spun directly on the sticks, too, and stays firm in use . . . with double tips for extra thrift and convenience. So be sure the cotton tips you use bear the trusted name of those famous baby specialists . . . Johnson & Johnson. Come in 29¢ and 49¢ sizes.



A MOTHER'S LOVE gives her a deep understanding of her baby's special needs, of course . . . but, when it comes to choosing a cereal, I think it's wise to consult your pediatrician. And chances are he'll recommend CREAM OF RICE . . . because child specialists have found that it has distinct advantages over any other kind of cereal.

1. CREAM OF RICE gives quicker nutrition . . . new life begins to pour into the system in a few minutes. 2. It gives more energy, too . . . with precious Vitamins B_1, B_2 and Niacin added, plus Iron for rich, red blood and better growth. 3. And CREAM OF RICE is easier to digest . . . and is least likely of all kinds of cereals to cause allergic reactions.

Besides being so good for babies, the think CREAM OF RICE tastes so-o good . . . in fact, all youngsters love th delicious, smooth 'n' creamy rice cere Just one suggestion, though . . . don't gi baby a "monopoly" on CREAM C RICE . . . the rest of the family will enj it, too. So ask your Grocer for a packa today . . . then serve it every day.

OF COURSE, you want to look your lovelie during the holidays, but remember . even the proudest beauties need a lit pampering. So give your hair this spec care . . . by using KREML Shampoo. A that isn't ju one of my p theories . John Rob Powers, f mous beau authority, r ommends i all his m els. Know why? Because, unlike dry shampoos that leave hair dry, brittle a unruly, KREML Shampoo has a natu oil base . . leaves hair soft as silk, an an to manage and even encourages any na ral curl. And I particularly like its ex lent cleansing qualities . . . the way t bring out your hair's natural highlig and make it glisten with star-bright she Since Friend Husband will want to l his best, too, get him KREML H Tonic . . . for it's an ideal way to keep hair neatly groomed and naturally place. Now comes in a new package at the lowest price in history . . . the 16-oz. size saves you up to 40%.

THE CHRISTMAS SEASON is yours to enjoy... but there's little joy in it if you suffer from a painful, burning corn. And it's so unnecessary . . . for new BLUE-JAY Corn Plasters will bring you quick, comforting relief. The credit goes to their new Wonder Drug, PHENYLIUM . . . the first really new medication for corns (and calluses) in over 70 years. In actual tests it went to work 33% faster than other leading remedies and the reason is this . . . PHENYLIUM gets down under the corn and helps push it out . . . from underneath. That's why New-Formula BLUE-JAY Corn Plasters with wondrous PHENYLIUM (pronounced fen-ill-ee-um) bring quicker, surer removal of corns than any other treatment known . . . and why 3 out of every 4 corn sufferers who tested it say: "It's better than any corn treatment I've ever used before!" So don't depend on old-style remedies any longer . . . get BLUE-JAY Corn (and Callus) Plasters with the amazing new Wonder Drug, PHENYLIUM, and enjoy the quickest, surest corn removal ever!

YOU don't want any member of your family to suffer from a cold, hay-fever or some similar complaint during the holidays, either . . . but you never can tell when these troubles may come "visiting". So be prepared . . . by getting a DeVILBISS Atomizer this very day. And be sure it is a DeVILBISS Atomizer . . . because it's especially engineered to apply any nasal or throat solution your doctor may prescribe . . . including penicillin and other new antibiotics which require a super-fine mist. It also provides the easiest and best method of covering all the infected area of nose and throat . . . which is important since relief is more prolonged when treatment is thorough. A DeVILBISS Atomizer is non-corrosive and designed to last a lifetime, too . . . yet is so compact it fits into any medicine chest. But why go on . . . you know as well as I do that every home needs a good atomizer and, in my opinion, a DeVILBISS is the best. Comes in two styles and sizes . . . only $1.50 and $2.00.

Christmas has a very special, very personal, meaning to each one of us . . . for every family has some cherished ceremony or act that has gradually become a Christmas custom. These we call family traditions . . . the golden threads that run through our lives . . . more loved because they closely bind successive generations together. So guard the things your family loves to do together during this joyous season . . . for they'll easily and naturally grow into unforgettable remembrances and become your own family traditions! And now . . . a very Merry Christmas to you all!

This time, when he wrote his letter, I stood over him, so that I could be certain what he said to her. He did not mention my name. He talked of the estate. It was the wish of the estate that provision should be made for her.

"If you do not wish to seem mixed up in the affair," he said to me, "you had better not take the letter. Dobson has to go your way this afternoon. He can take the letter for me. It will look better."

"Excellent," I said, "and I will go to the bank. Thank you, uncle."

"Don't forget to see Louise before you go," he said. "I think she is somewhere in the house."

I could have done without Louise, in my impatience to be off, but I could not say so. She was in the parlor, as it happened, and I was obliged to pass the open door.

"I thought I heard your voice," she said. "Have you come to spend the day? Let me give you some cake and fruit."

"I have to go at once," I said, "thank you, Louise. I only rode over to see my godfather on a business matter."

"Oh," she said, "I see." Her expression, that had been cheerful and natural, turned back to the stiff look of Sunday. "And how is Mrs. Ashley?"

"My Cousin Rachel is well, and exceedingly busy," I said. "All the shrubs she brought home from Italy have arrived, and she is planting them with Tamlyn."

"I should have thought you would have stayed at home to help her," said Louise.

I don't know what it was about the girl, but this new inflection in her voice was strangely irritating.

"You know perfectly well I am a fool at gardening," I said, and then, from deviltry, I added, "Haven't you got over your ill humor yet?"

She drew herself up, and flushed. "Ill humor? I don't know what you mean."

"Oh, yes, you do," I answered. "You were in a vile humor the whole of Sunday. It was most noticeable. I wonder the Pascoe girls did not remark upon it."

"The Pascoe girls were probably far too busy remarking something else."

"And what was that?" I asked.

"How simple it must be for a woman of the world, like Mrs. Ashley, to twist a young man like yourself around her finger," said Louise.

I turned on my heel and left the room. I could have struck her.

By the time I had ridden back along the highroad from Pelyn, and across country down into town, and so home again, I must have covered near on twenty miles. I had paused for a draught of cider at the inn on the town quay, but had eaten nothing, and was well-nigh famished by four o'clock.

I walked to the house, and went into the library. There fire was burning brightly, but there was no sign of my Cousin Rachel. I rang the bell for Seecombe.

"Where is Mrs. Ashley?" I asked.

"MADAM came in a little after three, sir," he said. "She and the gardeners have been working in the grounds ever since you left. Tamlyn is in the stewards' room with me now. He says he has never seen anything like it, the manner in which the mistress sets about it. He says she's a wonder."

"She must be exhausted," I said.

"I was afraid of that, sir. I suggested she should go to bed, but she would not hear of it. 'Tell the boys to bring me up cans of hot water, I'll take a bath, Seecombe,' she said to me, 'and I'll wash my hair as well.' I was about to send for my niece—it seems hardly right for a lady to wash her own hair—but she would not hear of that either."

"The boys had better do the same for me," I told him. "And I'm devilish hungry. I want my dinner early."

"Very well, sir," Seecombe said. "At a quarter to five?"

"Please, Seecombe. If you can manage it."

I went upstairs, whistling, to throw my clothes off, and sit in the steaming tub before my bedroom fire. As I rubbed myself dry with the towel I noticed that on the table beside my bed was a bowl of flowers. Sprigs from the woods, orchids and cyclamen among them. No one had ever put flowers in my room before. It must have been my Cousin Rachel. The sight of the flowers added to my mood of high good humor. I tied my cravat and put on my dinner coat. Then I went along the corridor, and knocked upon the door of the boudoir.

"Who is it?" she called from within.

"It is me—Philip," I answered. "I have come to tell you that dinner will be early tonight. I'm starving, and so I should think are you, after the tales I've heard. What have you and Tamlyn been up to that you have to take a bath and wash your hair?"

That bubble of laughter, so infectious, was her answer. "We've been burrowing underground, like moles," she called.

"Have you earth up to your eyebrows?"

"Earth everywhere. I've had my bath, and now I am drying my hair. I am pinned up and presentable, and look exactly like Aunt Phoebe. You may come in."

I OPENED the door and went into the boudoir. She was sitting on the stool before the fire, and for a moment I scarcely recognized her, she looked so different out of mourning. She had a white dressing wrapper around her, tied at the throat and at the wrists with ribbon; and her hair was pinned on the top of her head. I had never seen anything less like Aunt Phoebe, or Aunt Anyone.

"Come and sit down; don't look so startled," she said to me.

I shut the door behind me, and went and sat down on a chair. "Forgive me," I said, "but the point is that I have never seen a woman in undress before."

Hardly a man can you find who could live with his door open. —SENECA.

"This isn't undress," she said. "It's what I wear at breakfast. Ambrose used to call it my nun's robe." She raised her arms, and began to jab pins into her hair. "At twenty-four," she said, "it is high time you saw a pleasant homely sight such as Aunt Phoebe doing up her hair. Are you embarrassed?"

I folded my arms and continued to look at her. "Not in the slightest," I told her. "Merely stunned."

She laughed, and holding the pins in her mouth, took them one by one and, winding her hair into a roll, placed it the way it should go, in the low knot behind.

"Do you do that every day, in so short a time?" I asked, amazed.

"Oh, Philip, what a lot you have to learn," she said to me. "Have you never seen your Louise pin up her hair?"

"No, and I wouldn't want to," I answered swiftly, with a sudden memory of Louise's parting remark as I left Pelyn.

My Cousin Rachel laughed, and dropped a hairpin on my knee. "A keepsake," she said. "Put it under your pillow, and watch Seecombe's face at breakfast in the morning."

She passed from the boudoir into the bedroom opposite, leaving the door wide open.

"You can sit there and shout through to me while I dress," she called.

I looked furtively on the little bureau to see if there was any sign of my godfather's letter, but could see nothing.

"Where have you been all day?" she called to me.

"I had to go into town," I said. "There were people there I was obliged to see." I need not say a word about the bank.

"I was so happy with Tamlyn and the gardeners," she called. "There were only very few of the plants to be thrown away. There is so much, Philip, you know, still to be done in that plantation; the undergrowth bordering the meadow should be cleared, and a walk laid down, and the whole ground there given up to camellias. In less than twenty years you could have a spring garden that the whole of Cornwall would come to see."

"I know," I said. "That was what Ambrose intended."

"It needs careful planning," she said, "and not just left to chance and Tamlyn. He is a dear, but his knowledge is limited. Why do you not take more interest in it yourself?"

"I don't know enough," I said.

"There must be people who could help you," she said. "You could have a designer down from London to lay it out."

I did not answer. I did not want a designer down from London. I was pretty sure she knew more about it than any designer.

Just then Seecombe appeared and hovered in the passage.

"What is it, Seecombe?" I asked.

"Mr. Kendall's man, Dobson, has ridden over with a note for madam."

I heard Seecombe knock on her open door, and give in the letter. Suddenly I felt uneasy, nervous. She must be reading the letter. Ages seemed to pass. At last she came out of the bedroom, and she stood in the doorway, the letter open in her hand. She was dressed for dinner. Perhaps it was the contrast of her skin against the mourning that made her look so white.

"What have you been doing?" she said. Her voice sounded quite different.

"Doing?" I said. "Nothing. Why?"

"Don't lie, Philip. You don't know how to."

I stood most wretchedly before the fire, staring anywhere but into those searching, accusing eyes.

"You have been to Pelyn," she said. "You rode over there today to see your guardian. You made him write this letter."

"No," I said, swallowing, "I did nothing of the sort. He wrote it of his own accord. There was business to discuss, and it so happened that in talking, various legal matters came to the fore, and ——"

"And you told him your Cousin Rachel proposed giving lessons in Italian, isn't that the truth?" she said.

I FELT hot and cold and miserably ill at ease. "Not exactly," I said.

"Surely you realized I was only joking when I told you that?" she said.

If she was joking, I thought, why then must she be so angry with me now?

"You don't realize what you have done," she said. "You make me feel utterly ashamed." She went and stood by the window, with her back to me. "If you wish to humiliate me," she said, "by heaven, you have gone the right way about it."

"I don't see," I said, "why you have to be so proud."

"Proud?" She turned around, her eyes very dark and large, and looked at me in fury. "How dare you call me proud?" she said.

I stared back at her. I think I was amazed that anyone who a moment or two before had been laughing with me could suddenly become so angry. Then, to my own very great surprise, my nervousness went from me. I walked toward her and stood beside her.

"I shall call you proud," I said. "I shall go further, and I shall call you damnably proud. It is not you who are likely to be humiliated but me. It was not a joke, when you said that about giving lessons in Italian. Your answer came far too swiftly for it to be a joke. You said it because you meant it."

"AND if I did mean it?" she said. "Is there anything shameful in giving lessons in Italian?"

"In the ordinary sense, no," I said, "but in your case, yes. For Mrs. Ambrose Ashley to give lessons in Italian is shameful; it reflects upon the husband who neglected to make provision for her in his will. And I, Philip Ashley, his heir, won't permit it. You will take that allowance every quarter, Cousin Rachel, and when you draw the money from the bank, please remember that it does not come from the estate, nor from the heir to the estate, but from your husband, Ambrose Ashley."

For one moment I thought she was going to hit me. She stood quite still, staring up at me. Then her eyes filled with tears; and pushing past me, she went into the bedroom and slammed the door. I walked downstairs. I went to the dining room and rang the bell and told Seecombe that I thought Mrs. Ashley would not be down for dinner.

"Is madam indisposed, sir, do you think?" he asked me.

I might have told him that madam was not so much indisposed as in a fury, and would probably ring her bell in a moment and demand Wellington and the carriage to take her back to Plymouth.

"No," I said, "her hair is not yet dry. You had better tell John to take a tray up to the boudoir."

This, I supposed, was what men faced when they were married. Slammed doors, and silence. Dinner alone. Ambrose had been so right when he used to say that women were a race apart. One thing was certain now: I should never marry.

Dinner over, I went and sat in the library. I lit my pipe, and put my feet up on the fire irons, and composed myself to that after-dinner slumber that can be sweet and nonchalant upon occasion, but tonight lacked every charm. I had become used to the sight of her in the chair opposite my own, her shoulders turned so that the light fell upon her work, and Don at her feet; now the chair looked strangely empty. I got up and went upstairs to my room. I was just about to chuck my coat off on the chair, when I saw a note, placed beside the bowl of flowers. I picked up the note, and read it. It was from my Cousin Rachel.

Dear Philip: If you can bring yourself to do so, please forgive me for my rudeness to you tonight. I have no excuse, except that I am not entirely myself these days; emotion lies too near the surface. I have written to your guardian, thanking him for his letter, and accepting the allowance. It was generous and dear of you both to think of me. Good night. RACHEL.

I read the letter twice, and then put it in my pocket. Had it cost her much to write that note? I wondered. The swing from pride to humility? I hated the fact she had to do so. For the first time since he had died, I found myself blaming Ambrose for what had happened. A letter home to my godfather would have spared all this.

I hesitated for a moment; and then went along the corridor and stood under the archway by her rooms.

The door of the boudoir was open, the door of the bedroom shut. I knocked upon the bedroom door. For a moment no answer came, and then she said, "Who is it?"

I did not answer "Philip." I opened the door, and went inside. The room was in darkness, and the light from my candle showed the curtains of the bed to be partly drawn; and I could see the outline of her form under the coverlet.

"I have just read your note," I said. "I wanted to thank you for it, and to say good night."

I thought she might sit up and light her candle, but she did not do so.

"I wanted you to know also," I said, "that I had no idea of patronizing you. Please believe that."

The voice that came from the curtains was strangely quiet and subdued. "I never thought you had," she answered. We were both silent an instant. Then she said, "It would not worry me to give Italian lessons. I have no pride about that sort of thing. What I could not bear was when you said my doing so would reflect upon Ambrose."

"It was true," I said, "but forget it now. We need not think of it again."

"It was dear of you, and very like you," she said, "to go riding to Pelyn to see your guardian. I must have seemed completely lacking in gratitude. I can't forgive myself."

The voice, so near to tears again, did something to me.

"I would much rather you hit me than that you cried."

I heard her move in her bed, and feel for a handkerchief and blow her nose; the gesture and the sound, so commonplace and simple, happening there in the darkness made me even weaker than before.

PRESENTLY she said, "I will take the allowance, Philip, but I must not trespass on your hospitality after this week. I think next Monday I should leave here and move elsewhere."

A blank feeling came over me at her words. "But why? What for?"

"I only came for a few days. I have already stayed longer than I intended."

"But you have not met everybody yet," I said. "You have not done everything you are supposed to do."

"Does it matter?" she said. "After all, it seems so pointless." How unlike her it sounded, that lack of spirit in her voice.

"I thought you liked it," I said, "going about the estate, and visiting the tenants. And today, putting in those shrubs with Tamlyn. Was it all a show, and were you just being polite?"

She did not answer for a moment, and then she said, "Sometimes, Philip, I think you lack all understanding."

Probably I did. I felt sullen and hurt and I did not care.

"All right," I said, "if you want to go, do so. It will cause a lot of talk, but no matter."

"I should have thought," she said, "that it would cause more talk if I stayed."

"Talk if you stayed?" I said. "What on earth do you mean? Don't you realize that by rights you belong here, that if Ambrose had not been such a lunatic this would have been your home?"

"Oh," she flared out at me in sudden anger, "why else do you think I came?"

I HAD put my foot in it again. Blundering and tactless, I had said all the wrong things. I went up to the bed and pulled aside the curtains, and looked down at her. She was lying propped against her pillows, her hands clasped in front of her. She was wearing something white, filled at the neck like a choir boy's surplice, and her hair was loose, tied behind with a piece of ribbon, as I remembered Louise's as a child. It shocked me that she should look so young.

"Listen," I said, "I don't know why you came, or what were your motives in doing all you have done. I don't know anything about you, or about any woman. All I know is that I like it now you are here. And I don't want you to go. Is that complicated?"

She had put her hands up to her face, almost in defense. "Yes," she said, "very."

"Then it is you who make it so. Not I."

I folded my arms and looked at her, assuming an ease of manner I was far from feeling. I saw her eyes waver; she was searching in her mind for some new reason why she should be gone, and in a sudden flash I hit upon a master stroke of strategy.

"You told me this evening," I said, "that I should have a designer down from London, to lay out the gardens. If you have any feeling for the place, knowing what it meant to Ambrose, you would remain here for a few months, and do it for me."

Who builds a church to God, and not to fame, will never mark the marble with his name. —ALEXANDER POPE.

The shaft struck home. She stared in front of her, playing with her ring. I had remarked before that when preoccupied, this was a trick of hers.

"I think I should ask your godfather what he thinks," she said.

"It does not concern my godfather," I said. "There is only one consideration. Whether you yourself desire to stay, or not. If you really want to go, I cannot keep you."

She said, surprisingly, in a still small voice, "Why do you ask that? You know I want to stay."

Sweet heaven, how could I know? She had intimated the exact opposite.

"Then you will remain for a little while," I said, "to do the garden? That is settled, and you won't go back on your word?"

"I will remain," she said, "for a little while."

"Very well," I said, "then I will bid you good night, and leave you. What about your letter to my godfather? Do you want me to put it in the post bag?"

"Seecombe has taken it," she said.

"Then you will sleep now, and not be angry with me any more?"

"I was not angry, Philip."

"But you were. I thought you were going to hit me."

She looked up at me. "Sometimes you are so stupid," she said, "that I think one day I will. Come here."

I drew closer, my knee touched the coverlet.

"Bend down," she said. She took my face between her hands, and kissed me. "Now go to bed like a good boy, and sleep well." She pushed me away, and drew her curtains.

I stumbled out of the blue bedroom with my candlestick, lightheaded and somehow dazed. The last word, and the last gesture, too, had been with her. The little-girl look and the choir-boy surplice had misled me. She was a woman all the time. For all that, I was happy.

Instead of going immediately to bed, I went down to the library once again, to write a line to my godfather, and to reassure n that all had gone off well. I scribbled my t er, and went into the hall to place it in h post bag for the morning. Seecombe had f the bag for me, as was his custom, upon table in the hall, with the key beside it. hen I opened up the bag two other letters into my hand. Both written by my usin Rachel. One was addressed to my lfather, Nick Kendall. The second letter s addressed to Signor Rainaldi, in Florence. tared at it a moment, then put it back h the others in the post bag.

t was foolish of me, perhaps; the man was friend, why should she not write a letter im? Yet, as I went upstairs to bed, I felt f she had hit me after all.

The only difference in her man- to me was that she seemed more gentle, more tender; she teased me less, and t asking my opinion as to the planting of shrubs.

Do what you want to do," I told her.

"It just happens that I have never moved that way."

That's very evident," she said. "You t be a heartbreak to the neighborhood. t poor Louise!"

It I was not going to be led into a dis- on on Louise, nor again into a dissertation upon love and matrimony. I was much interested to watch her work upon the en.

With my love for gardening," she told . "goes a knowledge of herbs. In Italy, ways made a study of these things." she would produce balm from some to rub upon wheezing chests, and oil another, as a measure against burns; she would instruct them, too, how to tisane, as a remedy for indigestion and eeplessness—the best nightcap in the world, she said to them—and how the juice of certain fruits could cure almost any ill from a sore throat to a sty on the eyelid.

"You know what will happen," I told her, "you will take the place of midwife in the district. They will send for you in the night to deliver babies, and once that starts there will be no peace for you at all."

"There is a tisane for that, too," she said, "made from the leaves of nettles and of raspberries. If a woman drinks that for six months before the birth, she has her baby without pain."

"That's witchcraft," I said. "They wouldn't think it right to do so."

"What nonsense. Why should women suffer?" said my Cousin Rachel.

Sometimes, in the afternoons, she would be called upon by the County, as I had warned her. And she was equally successful with the "gentry," as Seecombe called them, as she had been with the humbler folk.

There was always some story of the callers with which she greeted me when I returned home, and we would laugh together, and she would smooth her hair before the mirror, and straighten the cushions, while I polished off the last of the sweet cakes that had been put before the visitors.

THE whole thing would seem like a game, like a conspiracy; yet I think she was happy there, sitting in the drawing room making conversation. People and their lives had interest for her, how they thought, and what they did; and she used to say to me, "But you don't understand, Philip, this is all so new after the very different society in Florence. I have always wondered about life in England, in the country. Now I am beginning to know. And I love every minute of it."

"I can think of nothing more monotonous," I told her, "than discussing generalities with anyone, in Florence or in Cornwall."

"Oh! But you are hopeless," she said, "and will end up very narrow-minded, thinking of nothing but turnips and kale."

I would fling myself down in the chair, and on purpose to try her, put my muddy boots upon the stool. She never reproved me, and if she had noticed, did not appear to do so.

"Go on," I would say, "tell me the latest scandal in the county."

"But if you are not interested," she would answer, "why should I do so?"

"Because I like to hear you talk," I would tell her.

So before going upstairs to change for dinner, she would regale me with county gossip—what there was of it: the latest betrothals, marriages and deaths, the new babies on the way; she appeared to glean more from twenty minutes' conversation with a stranger than I would from an acquaintance after a lifetime.

"As I suspected," she told me, "you are the despair of every mother within fifty miles."

"Why so?"

"Because you do not choose to look at any of their daughters. So tall, so presentable, so eligible in every way. There is heavy betting upon Louise. Quite a number say that she will get you in the end. And the third Miss Pascoe has a sporting chance."

"Great heaven!" I exclaimed. "Belinda Pascoe? I'd as soon marry Katie Searle, who does the washing. Really, Cousin Rachel, what staggers me is the way in which the minds of women in this part of the world—perhaps it's the same everywhere—run perpetually upon marriage."

"They have not much else to think about," she said. "The choice of fare is small. I do not escape discussion, I can tell you. A list of eligible widowers has been given me. There is a peer down in West Cornwall declared to be the very thing. Fifty, an heir, and both daughters married."

"Not old St. Ives?" I said, in tones of outrage.

"Why, yes, I believe that is the name. They say he's charming."

The world will never starve for wonders; but only for want of wonder.

DISCRIMINATING PEOPLE PREFER

HERBERT TAREYTON

MRS. HENRY BILLINGS, beautiful young New York socialite. Discriminating in her choice of cigarettes, Mrs. Billings says: "This year I'm giving cartons of Herbert Tareytons in their special Christmas wrapping."

Discriminating people prefer Herbert Tareyton. They appreciate the kind of smoking that only fine tobacco and a genuine cork tip can give. The cork tip doesn't stick to the lips . . . it's clean and firm. And discriminating people prefer Herbert Tareyton because their modern size not only means a longer, cooler smoke, but that extra measure of fine tobacco makes Herbert Tareyton today's most unusual cigarette value.

"Charming, my eye," I said to her. "He's always drunk by midday, and creeps around the passages after the maids. Billy Rowe had a niece in service there. She had to come back home, she grew so scared."

"Who's talking gossip now? Poor Lord St. Ives; perhaps if he had a wife he would not creep about the passages. It would, of course, depend upon the wife."

"Well, you're not going to marry him," I said with firmness.

"You could at least invite him here to dinner," she suggested, her eyes full of that solemnity that I had learned now spelled mischief. "We could have a party, Philip. The prettiest young women for you, and the best-favored widowers for me. But I think I have made my choice. I think if I am ever put to it, I will take your godfather, Mr. Kendall."

Maybe she did it on purpose, but I rose to the bait, exploding. "You cannot seriously mean it. Why, he's nearing sixty; and he's never without a chill or some complaint."

"That means he doesn't find warmth or comfort inside his house as you do."

I knew then that she was laughing, so laughed with her; but afterward, I wondered about it with mistrust.

Next Sunday, when my godfather, on the right of my Cousin Rachel, bent his deaf ear to her, and suddenly sat back, laughing, and saying "Oh, capital, capital," I wondered sulkily why it was that they laughed so much together. This, I thought, is another trick of women. To throw a jest in the air, that left a sting behind it.

She sat there, at Sunday dinner, looking remarkably well and in high good humor, with my godfather on her right, and the vicar on her left, none of them at a loss for conversation, and for no good reason I turned sulky and silent, just as Louise had done that first Sunday. Louise sat looking at her plate, and I at mine. Our silence spurred my Cousin Rachel to greater effort, in order, I suppose, to cover it; and she and my godfather and the vicar tried to cap one another, quoting verse. But when they had all gone, my Cousin Rachel took me to task.

"When," she said, "I entertain your friends, I do look to have a little support from you. What was wrong, Philip? You sat there, scowling, and never addressed a word to either neighbor."

"There was so much gaiety at your end," I answered her, "that I saw no point in contributing to it. All that nonsense about 'I love you' in Greek. And the vicar telling you that 'my heart's delight' sounded very well in Hebrew."

"Well, so it did," she said. "And your godfather wants to show me the beacon head by moonlight. Once seen, he tells me, never forgotten."

"Well, he's not showing it to you," I replied. "The beacon is my property. There is some old earthwork that belongs to the Pelyn estate. Let him show you that. It's covered thick in brambles." And I threw a lump of coal upon the fire, hoping the clatter bothered her.

"I don't know what's come over you," she said. "You are losing your sense of humor." And she patted me on the shoulder, and went upstairs.

That was the infuriating thing about a woman. Always the last word. Leaving one to grapple with ill temper, with herself serene. A woman, it seemed, was never in the wrong. Or if she was, she twisted the fault to her advantage.

She would fling these pinpricks in the air, these hints of moonlight strolls with my godfather, or some other expedition—a visit to Lostwithiel market—and ask me in all seriousness whether she should wear the new bonnet that had come from London—the veil had a wider mesh and did not shroud her, my godfather had told her it became her well; and when I fell to sulking, saying I did not care whether she concealed her features with a mask, her mood soared to serenity yet higher, making me seem more sulky than I was. Then, in the library afterward, she would relent; the serenity was with her still, but a kind of tenderness came too. She asked me to hold her silks for her, to choose the colors I liked best, because she wanted to work a covering for me to use on the chair in the estate office. And quietly, without probing, she asked me questions on my day, whom I had seen, what I had done, so that all sulkiness went from me, and I was eased and rested.

It was as if my change of mood afforded her delight, but why it should do so I had no remote idea. I only knew that when she teased me I disliked it, and it hurt. And when she was tender, I was happy and at peace.

By the end of the month the fine weather broke. It rained for three days solid, and there was no gardening to be done, and all callers were kept within their doors, like the rest of us.

It was Seecombe who suggested what I think the pair of us had both been shirking: that the time was opportune to go through Ambrose's effects. He broached it one morning as my Cousin Rachel and I stood by the library window, staring out at the rain.

"The office for me," I had just observed, "and a day in the boudoir for you. What about those boxes down from London? More gowns to sort, and try upon your person?"

"Not gowns," she said, "but coverings for curtains. I think the blue bedroom should live up to its name. At present it is gray. And the quilting to the bed had moth, but don't tell Seecombe. I have chosen you new curtains, and new quilting."

It was then that Seecombe entered, and said, "The weather being so inclement, sir, I had thought the boys might be put to extra cleaning withindoors. Your old room needs attention. But they cannot dust while Mr. Ashley's trunks cover the floor."

"Very well," I said. "Let us have the fire lit; when the room is warm we'll go up."

I think that both of us tried to conceal our feelings one from the other. We forced a sort of brightness into our behavior, and into our conversation. The fire, that had not been lit since last winter, burned with a false crackle. The boxes stood in a line upon the floor, waiting to be opened.

My Cousin Rachel broke the silence. "Come," she said, "shall we open the clothes trunk first?"

I handed her the keys. "Just as you will."

She put the key in the lock, and turned it, and threw open the lid. His old dressing gown was on the top. I knew it well. It was of heavy silk in a dark red color. His slippers were there, too, long and flat. I stood there staring at them, and it was like walking back into the past. I remembered him padding into my room wearing that dressing gown. Wearing those slippers. My Cousin Rachel took them from the trunk.

THE HOLIDAY LINGERS ON

A jolly good way to remember your friends and relatives this Christmas is to send LADIES' HOME JOURNAL gift subscriptions. They are easy to order. They last all year and the cost is small compared to the pleasure given. Each gift will be announced in your name with a beautiful card in full rich colors, mailed to arrive at just the right time before Christmas.

A handy order form is in nearly every copy of this issue.

"What shall we do with them?" she said, and the voice was lower now, subdued.

"I don't know. It's for you to say."

"Would you wear them, if I gave them to you?" she asked.

"No," I said, "no, I don't think so."

She put them on the bed. She came next to a lightweight suit. It was not familiar to me. She took it out, and placed it with the dressing gown. Suddenly she began lifting the things from the trunk very swiftly.

"I think," she said, "that if you don't want them, Philip, the people on the estate, who loved him, might like to have them. You will know best what to give, and to whom."

I THINK she did not see what she was doing. She took them from the trunk in a sort of frenzy, while I stood by, and watched her.

"The trunk?" she said. "A trunk is always useful. You could do with the trunk?" She looked up at me, and her voice faltered. Suddenly she was in my arms, her head against my chest. "Oh, Philip," she said, "forgive me. I should have let you and Seecombe do it. I was a fool to come upstairs."

It was queer. Like holding a child. I touched her hair, and put my cheek against her head.

"It's all right," I said, "don't cry. Go back to the library. I can finish it alone."

"No," she said. "It's just as bad for you as it is for me. You loved him so."

"I don't mind," I said. "Let me do it, Rachel, go downstairs."

She stood a little way apart, and wiped her eyes with her handkerchief. "No," she said, "I'm better now. And I have unpacked the clothes. But if you will give them to the people on the estate, I shall be grateful."

The boxes of books were nearer to the fire. I brought a chair, and placed it for her close to the warmth; and knelt beside the other trunks and opened them, one by one.

I hoped she had not noticed—I had barely noticed it myself—that for the first time I had not called her "cousin." But "Rachel." I don't know how it happened. I think it must have been because standing there, with my arms about her, she had been so much smaller than myself.

The books did not have the personal touch about them that the clothes had. There were old favorites with which he always traveled, and these she gave to me, to keep beside my bed. There were his cuff links, too, his studs, his watch, his pen—all these she pressed upon me. I was glad of them.

She came upon a volume of drawings of the layout of gardens. "This will be very useful to us," she said, and rising from her chair, took it to the window to see it better.

I opened another book at random. A piece of paper fell from between the leaves. It had Ambrose's handwriting upon it. It seemed like the middle scrap of a letter, torn from its context, and forgotten:

> It's a disease, of course, I have often heard of it, like kleptomania or some other malady, and has no doubt been handed down to her from her spendthrift father, Alexander Coryn. How long she has been a victim of it I cannot say, perhaps always; certainly it explains much of what has disturbed me hitherto in all this business. This much I do know, dear boy: that I cannot any longer—nay, I dare not—let her have command over my purse, or I shall be ruined. It is imperative that you warn Kendall, if by any chance ——

The sentence broke off. The scrap of paper was not dated. The handwriting was normal. Just then she came back from the window. I crumpled the piece of paper in my hand.

"What have you there?" she said.

"Nothing," I said. I threw the piece of paper on the fire. She saw the handwriting on the paper curl in the flame.

"That was Ambrose's writing," she said. "What was it? Was it a letter?"

"It was just some note he had made," I said, "on an old scrap of paper."

I felt my face burn in the light of the fire. Then I reached for another volume from the trunk. She did the same. We continued sorting books, side by side, together; but the silence had come between us.

How lucky that babies love yellow!

The littlest member of the family hasn't reached the stage of being entirely clear about colors yet, you know. Except for yellow! Babies see yellow early. And they not only see it in all its golden prettiness, but are quick to learn that yellow vegetables have the sweetest, most delightful taste.

That's a blessing! For diet specialists invariably recommend at least one green or one yellow vegetable a day for everyone, from babies right through to great-grandparents. So, for both health and happiness, introduce your baby early to Gerber's golden squash.

Gerber's Strained Squash has a creamy-smooth, purée-like texture. It feels good on baby's tongue . . . it's easy for baby to digest. Gerber's Junior Squash is firmer in texture with small bits designed especially for teething toddlers.

Naturally, both Strained and Junior Squash have the superb qualities that Gerber's are famous for in all of their more than 50 varieties: The wonderful true-flavor and true-color that babies love. The processing that helps retain natural goodness. The special care that's given by experts who make baby foods and nothing else. No wonder babies thrive on Gerber's, from starting cereals through strained and junior foods.

Babies are our business... our only business!

Even for "simple tummy-ache" the cause is not always obvious. There may be unsuspected physical or emotional disturbances.

Not Always "Something He Ate"

By Dr. Herman N. Bundesen

President, Chicago Board of Health

A NOTION I encounter frequently is that when a child vomits it is because of something "indigestible" he has eaten. Parents are inclined to think hey shouldn't bother the doctor about a mple tummy-ache. If a child has repeated igestive upsets, they are often attributed a "delicate stomach"—and nothing is one about it.

It is true that in a few cases, an allergy a certain food or foods may be respon- ble—it really is "something he ate."

Nevertheless, the situation calls for investigation. An alert mother may remember that each episode of vomiting was preceded by a meal featuring some particular dish. By eliminating the offending food, she can usually prevent recurrence of the disturbance. In less obvious cases, the doctor should be called upon. He will test the child's responses to a number of foods until the offending one, or "allergen," is identified. The child should not be made to go on suffering sickness that can be done away with.

It has been my experience, however, that a comparatively small number of digestive upsets in children are due to allergy. As I have told mothers time after time, vomiting in most children is caused by a specific infection, or by a disorder of the nervous system, or by excessive anxiety or some other nervous disturbance. If a child is given to upchucking, by all means find out the reason for it!

Sometimes the cause of repeated stomach difficulty proves to be some defect in the digestive mechanism. Occasionally these appear in infancy. In rare instances tiny babies who vomit constantly are found to have a condition called "pyloric stenosis"—a closure or contraction of the pyloric valve, which is the opening from the stomach into the small intestine. Other defects which may cause severe and repeated digestive disorders in babies are intussusception, a condition in which the intestine is folded back into itself, and obstructions or adhesions of the stomach or intestinal tract. These conditions can be discovered only by the most complete and careful examination, including X-ray study of the digestive system. For that reason it is important to call the doctor when a baby or small child vomits more than once or twice. If one of these defects is found, expert care or difficult surgery may be needed in order to correct the condition.

Another reason why it is wise to call the doctor when the child vomits is that this is frequently an early sign of infection. Scarlet fever, measles, whooping cough and chicken pox, for example, are all likely to be introduced with spells of vomiting. Vomiting also occurs frequently during the onset of pneumonia, influenza and poliomyelitis.

It should be borne in mind, further, that vomiting is an early symptom of acute appendicitis. The food that is vomited is ejected forcefully, and retching continues after all the food in the stomach has been lost. Since appendicitis is a dangerous disease even when it is recognized promptly, it is wise to keep in touch with the doctor. If vomiting is followed by abdominal pain, he will wish to have a blood test made to check the possibility of appendicitis.

However, I have found that in many cases a tendency to vomit is caused by nervous anxiety rather than by any digestive defect or infection. Often the cause is a feeling of insecurity. The child has found that an illness makes him the focus of family interest, which satisfies this deep-seated inner need. A subconscious craving for love and attention may then emerge in the form of dramatic, violent episodes of vomiting. These children are sometimes called "habit vomiters."

I remember one such case in particular that was a puzzle for many months. Judith was a healthy, normal little girl, the third child in a family and several years younger than her brother and sister. As is usual in such cases, loving attention was focused on her, the older children joining their parents in lavishing praise and favor on little Judy, who was a pretty, happy baby.

When she was five or six years old, Judy began to have occasional severe spells of vomiting. Careful examination and study revealed no abnormal condition that could be responsible, no allergy, no apparent infection. In talking to her mother about this problem, I became aware that each episode seemed to come at a particularly inconvenient time for the family. When the parents were planning a supper party for a group of their friends, for example, or when one of the older children was going to be in a recital or play at school, Judy was almost sure to turn up "sick at her stomach," with the result that mother often had to change her plans and stay home to take care of her.

Judy wasn't consciously making herself sick, or malingering. Her response to the situation was wholly subconscious. What she needed was to understand that these special occasions did not mean that she was any the less loved and wanted by her preoccupied parents and brother and sister. In time, we helped Judy get over her "delicate stomach" by letting her help with the arrangements and greet the guests when mother and daddy had a party, and by including her whenever possible on occasions involving the older children.

In other cases, however, feelings of anxiety and insecurity may be deep-rooted and harder to deal with; as when a child is truly unloved or unwanted, for example, or when there is ill feeling between the children in a family, or conflict between the mother and father. A so-called dyspeptic found that he could eat any food after he had been happily married for a year or so. It was the constant quarreling between his father and mother that had made certain dishes "poison" to him throughout his childhood and youth. Where bitterness in the home atmosphere is responsible for a child's vomiting episodes, the family doctor may need the aid of a psychiatrist—for the parents, not the child—before the condition can be cleared up.

POLITICAL BABES IN THE WOODS AGAINST THE SHARP BOYS

"We can hold the party and still help you get elected," the members had said. But the business of politics is not a part-time, now-we-do-now-we-don't proposition.

There are as many reasons given for the defeat of the reform movement as there are interested persons in East St. Louis. But Bob Barracks, managing editor of the crusading East St. Louis Journal, who supported Bernice and her fellow board members, said simply, "Bernice and her fellow candidates were political babes in the woods up against the sharp boys."

The kind of campaign put on by the "sharp boys," the politicos who backed the winning ticket, left a bad taste in the mouths of many East St. Louisans. Anyone who knows East St. Louis politics knows that East St. Louisans play politics no-holds-barred and the dark-brown taste in the political mouth doesn't come easily. To an outsider, the vicious whispering campaign, the cynical pamphleteering, and the money paid to precinct committeemen, would contrast oddly with the high ideals usually connected with the no-pay school-board positions.

To Bernice's surprise, she found out too late—after the election—that for nearly three years one of her political enemies had been waging a constant whispering campaign against her, slowly but surely building up to a "beat Goedde" campaign to defeat the reform movement.

The whispering campaign painted Bernice with two brushes: one, Miss Goedde, the bossy, arrogant dictator who runs things her way; and the other, "that Protestant Miss Goedde," the anti-Catholic, Ku Klux Klanner.

The first was designed to play up the feeling many men have against women in any activity outside the home. The second was shaped to appeal to the large Catholic population in the city. To the credit of all East St. Louisans, the play for religious intolerance seemed to have little effect.

Unfortunately, Bernice herself aided the first charge in the minds of many critics. Oftentimes she would ride roughshod over opposition in matters where she felt she was right. With too little display of tact she would turn down well-intentioned advice. "Bernice would do better if she would stop competing with men as a man and use some of her feminine charm," one of her best friends said ruefully.

The second charge could have been refuted with the reminder that several members of the school board backed by Bernice were Catholic. The emphasis must be on the "could," for as Bernice said, "Whispering campaigns are hard to combat. I didn't know about the religious attacks until several days prior to the election, when my phone would ring all hours of the day or night bringing abuse from emotional people who had just heard the whisper."

The pamphlet campaign was cold, cynical politicking based on the touchy race-relations difficulty in East St. Louis. One pamphlet was found in the "white" areas of the city accusing Bernice of being pro-Negro because under her administration segregation was ended in the schools. Another pamphlet found in the Negro areas accused her with equal vehemence of being anti-Negro. Both sets of pamphlets were distributed the day before the election.

The scene at most of the polling places in the city April thirteenth is indicative of the money spent by Bernice's opposition. An official poll watcher for the board of election commissioners described the picture he saw repeated all over the city:

"All day long the precinctmen and their workers drove voters to the polls. I saw no one working for Miss Goedde's ticket."

Charles Hook, a board member running for re-election with Bernice, smelled defeat about noon when he saw the busy precinct committeemen. "If I'd known you fellows were going to be paid to work like this, I'd have saved my effort," he told one of the precinct bosses.

There have been many estimates of the money spent, but a conservative guess runs about $3000, with as much as $100 to $300 going to key precinct committeemen.

Bernice had ample opportunity to look into the money-hungry palms of precinct-men before the election, when she and her fellow candidates sat in the little, crowded office of a weekly newspaper in one district of the city. "We'll support you for $500 a precinct," one politician said. Bernice and her candidates refused.

There is no breath of scandal without halitosis.

But this kind of opposition is not new to Bernice. She faced the same thing in 1948, but then she fought. What about 1951?

"We could never get a campaign going this time. We could get too few people to help with the leg work. I and my five fellow candidates never did get together, all at one meeting, to do any planning. And I don't really know why," she admits.

Perhaps the lethargy among Goedde supporters was due to the effectiveness of the whispering campaign, for there was little enthusiastic support for her or her ticket; maybe it was the difficulty in arousing people's defense of a good administration, compared with the drama of "throwing the rascals out."

The lack of enthusiasm even reached the members of her own ticket, for one fellow candidate said, "Maybe someone else should have filed for the presidency. I'm afraid Bernice will drag the whole slate down with her."

Bernice is sure that her chairmanship of the 1951 Red Cross fund drive in the city took too much of her time away from politics. But Bernice doesn't like the word "politics." Even now, after the defeat, she is firm in her stand that "I will not play politics." She defines politics as "hiring of unqualified people to pay political debts" and the payment to professional politicians to deliver safe votes.

When Bernice thinks of politics in these terms, her reaction is the only one a good citizen can take, but what about politics in the sense of mobilizing votes? She didn't play politics in the "bad" sense, but she also failed to play politics in the "good" sense. She made no move to organize a "people's machine" with citizen groups getting out the vote simply because they want to see good schools continue.

The "I'd have voted if I thought you would lose" which Bernice is tired of hearing everywhere she goes could have been avoided by the technique of playing "get out the vote" politics.

Bernice says she finds it significant that East St. Louis politicians boast they can get out 10,000 votes and that the newly elected school-board president received 10,022. But it is of more significance that Bernice received 16,303 votes in 1948 and only 4988 votes in 1951. A reform movement can win only with a huge vote. The controlled politician votes lie in wait for the reform movement that fails to attract the voters and then rise up to clobber the movement.

Praise for Bernice came from an unexpected source. A former close associate of the City Hall machine, now retired from politics, said, "I was sure Miss Goedde would win, for she had a good administration, but I think she will be a better leader in the community for the lessons she has learned at this election."

Barracks was more blunt: "The pattern here will be repeated next year unless those who want good schools learn politics."

OUR OWN YOUNG MARRIEDS

MEAT BALLS IN TOMATO SAUCE

Season 2 pounds ground beef with 2 teaspoons salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper. Add ⅓ cup dry bread crumbs, 3 tablespoons water and 1 slightly beaten egg. Mix well and shape into small balls—about 60 of them. Melt ¼ cup butter or margarine in hot skillet, add meatballs and brown well on all sides. Add ¾ cup chopped onion and 2 cloves garlic, chopped, and brown in pan drippings. Add 1 No. 2 can tomato purée, ½ cup water (or you could use three 8-ounce cans tomato sauce in place of water and purée), 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, ½ teaspoon salt, dash of Tabasco, ¼ cup chopped parsley and ¾ cup chopped celery. Cover and simmer 20 minutes. Season to taste. Serves 10.

CAULIFLOWER AU GRATIN

Remove outer leaves from 2 medium heads cauliflower; wash and separate into flowerets. Cook in boiled salted water until just tender. Arrange in a shallow pan. Make a cream sauce by blending ¾ cup butter or margarine with ¾ cup flour; gradually add 2 quarts milk, heat and stir until thickened. Season sauce with 2 teaspoons salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and ⅛ teaspoon dry mustard. Pour hot sauce over cauliflower; sprinkle with ½ cup buttered crumbs and ½ cup grated Cheddar cheese. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 15 minutes or until thoroughly heated through. Run under the broiler a few minutes for a final browning. Serves 10.

CRAB-ASPIC LOAF

Soak over two 6½-ounce cans crab meat, removing any shell. Combine crab meat with 1 cup mayonnaise, 1 pint cream or top milk, ½ teaspoons salt, pepper and ¾ teaspoon paprika. Soften 1½ envelopes unflavored gelatin in ⅓ cup cold water. Dissolve over hot water and add to crab mixture with ½ cup sliced scallions and 1 tablespoon lemon juice. Chill until it thickens. Pour into a 1-quart loaf-shaped pan and chill until set. Turn out. Garnish with tomato wedges. Serves 10.

NOODLE, HAM AND SOUR CREAM CASSEROLE

Cut into bite size or chop coarsely ¾ pound ready-to-eat ham. Cook one 8-ounce package egg noodles until tender. Mix 1 tablespoon grated onion with 1 pint sour cream. Grease a 2-quart casserole dish lightly, and as soon as noodles are drained and rinsed, but not dry and sticky, make a layer in the bottom of the casserole, then a layer of chopped ham, followed by ⅓ pint sour cream; repeat until there are 3 layers. Season each layer with salt and pepper. Having three is important, as it spreads the ham and sour cream more evenly through the noodles. Top with buttered bread crumbs and heat through thoroughly. If you place it high in the oven, the top will brown nicely in the time it takes it to heat through; another important point is that it mustn't stay in the oven (350° F.—20–30 minutes) long enough to dry out. Serves 6 hungry people or 4 starving.

RASPBERRY ICE-CREAM PIE

Make a graham-cracker crust by rolling 16 graham crackers until fine. Work in ¼ cup sugar and ¼ cup soft butter or margarine. Press crumb mixture against bottom and sides of a lightly greased 8" pie plate. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., 8–10 minutes. Cool. Fill the cooled shell with 1 quart soft vanilla ice cream. Place in freezing section of your refrigerator until ready to serve. This can be done the day before or the morning of the party. Serve with frozen raspberries which have just been thawed. Serves 6.

SOME mothers don't seem to know that well-shaped heads, fine full chest, strong backs and straight legs are not a matter of chance. Your baby and every baby, needs special help to build them.

You must give one particular thing—extra Vitamin D—not just when you think of it but every single day. Your own doctor insists on it, and new scientific studies show why.

For five years the teeth of two groups of children were studied. Only 7.2% of teeth decayed in the children who got extra Vitamin D and essential minerals daily. This compared with 12%—almost twice as many cavities—in the group that didn't always get ample Vitamin D.

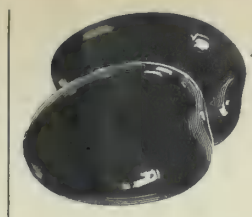
Have two 3-pound chickens cut into quarters. Place chicken skin side down in a shallow open pan (17" x 11" x 2½"). Add 1 large onion, sliced, 1 clove garlic and 1 quart water. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., 1 hour, turning occasionally. Meanwhile, prepare the barbecue sauce. Combine 1 teaspoon sugar, 1½ teaspoons dry mustard, 1½ teaspoons salt, ¼ teaspoon black pepper, 3 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce, 1½ cups tomato juice, ⅓ cup cider vinegar in a saucepan. Boil 10 minutes. Pour the sauce over the chicken. Baste the chicken every 15 minutes with the sauce. Bake until chicken is tender and sauce is reduced to a rich gravy. It takes about 1½–2 hours more. If your chicken is very tender before the sauce is reduced, you can pour off some of the sauce and boil it down to speed the thickening process. Serves 8.

STUFFED PICKLED MUSHROOMS

Remove stems from ½ pound small mushrooms. Wipe caps with a damp cloth. If the small raw ones are not available, use a 4-ounce can button mushrooms. Bring to a boil 1 cup red wine vinegar, ½ cup water, 1 teaspoon pickling spices, 3 thin slices lemon, 1 small onion, sliced, ½ teaspoon salt, 1 cut clove garlic and ½ teaspoon sugar; remove from heat at once. Pour over the mushrooms. Place a small saucer over mushrooms to hold them down in vinegar mixture. Let stand until cold. They may stand overnight, but this is not necessary. An hour before party time, drain and stuff the caps with filling, made by blending one 3-ounce package cream cheese with ⅛ teaspoon dry mustard, 1 teaspoon prepared horse-radish, ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce and 1 tablespoon minced parsley. Sprinkle tops with paprika.

CHOCOLATE-MINT ROLL



Whip 1½ cups heavy cream until just stiff; sweeten with ¼ cup sugar. Tint whipped cream a pleasing green with green food coloring and flavor with ⅛ teaspoon mint extract. Spread thin chocolate wafers with cream and stack together—use a full 10-ounce can of wafers. Frost the outside of the roll with the remaining mint cream. Garnish with shaved semisweet chocolate. Chill several hours. To serve, slice on the diagonal. Serves 8.

MINESTRONE

Soak 1 cup dried navy beans overnight in 1 quart water. If you forget to put the beans to soak the night before, you can bring the beans and water to a boil and soak 1 hour. Cut ¼ pound salt pork into small pieces and fry them slowly in a deep heavy kettle. Discard the pork pieces. Into the fat put 1 clove garlic, minced, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, 3 medium onions, sliced thin, and the white part of 3 leeks, sliced; cook 10 minutes more. Add the beans and the water in which they were soaked. Then add 1½ quarts water, 1 No. 2½ can tomatoes, 1½ cups sliced celery, 6 carrots sliced in rounds, 1 green pepper, chopped, 1 tablespoon salt, 1 teaspoon basil and ⅛ teaspoon black pepper. Simmer 2 hours. Add 1½ cups shredded cabbage, 1 cup peas, 1 cup Lima beans, and simmer 15 minutes. Then the final addition is ½ cup cooked macaroni. Serve hot with grated Parmesan cheese. Serves 8. This soup is best when made the day before the party.

APPLE CRISP

Beat 2 eggs well and gradually add 1 cup sugar, beating until light and fluffy. Sift together ⅔ cup flour, ¼ teaspoon salt and 2½ teaspoons baking powder. Add the dry ingredients to egg mixture. Mix well. Fold in 1 cup chopped apple which has been peeled and cored, 1 cup chopped walnuts and 2 teaspoons vanilla. Pour into greased glass baking dish, 12" x 7⅜" x 1½". Sprinkle top with ½ cup shredded coconut. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., 30 minutes. Cut into squares and serve with fluff of whipped cream. Serves 8.

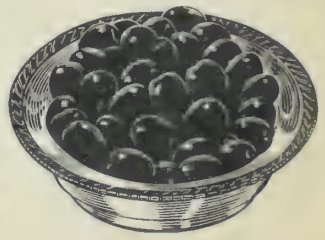
FROM CALIFORNIA

Elegant in Casseroles

CORONADO CASSEROLE



- ⅔ cup ripe olives
- 2 tbsps. butter or margarine
- 2 tbsps. flour
- 1 cup milk
- 1 can condensed mushroom soup
- ¼ cup chopped pimiento
- 1 tbsp. finely chopped parsley
- 6 hard-cooked eggs
- ⅔ cup crushed potato chips
- Pepper

Cut olives from pits into large pieces. Melt butter and blend in flour. Add milk and cook and stir until thickened. Stir in soup, olives, pimiento, parsley, sliced eggs, half of potato chips and pepper to taste. Pour into greased casserole. Top with remaining potato chips. Bake in moderately slow oven (325 degrees F.) 20 minutes. Serves 6.

THIS simple-minded creature waiting behind the door is a Boo-Booby. It thinks it is great fun to jump out at people who don't know it is there and shout BOO to scare them. Someday it is going to get hurt badly by being stuck in the eye or cut or scratched by something the other person is carrying. Or maybe the person it jumps out at is going to be badly frightened or hurt. Either way, it's a stupid thing to do, as this Boo-Booby will find out when this pot of hot coffee lands on its head. The Make-Believe Twins Ahoy, there, people! You'd better take warning that Peter's a Pirate chief this morning with a really ferocious pirate Crew. And Penny, of course, is a Pirate too.

Tied to the bedpost (that's their mast), a skull-and-crossbones is fluttering fast. And, shiver my timbers! But there's a fight whenever an enemy heaves in sight.

With a patch on his Eye and his sword in hand, Peter is leading his cutthroat band against Black Roger, that bold sea rover, who'll walk the Plank when the Battle's over.

(Roger, you see, is a Wicked sort while Penny and Pete, I'm glad to report, are really good pirates Everyone knows they only attack their country's foes.)

With Roger beaten, they soon are rid of Long John Silver and Captain Kidd, till the twins have so many bags of Gold and such crowds of captives here in the hold that, pulling their skull-and-crossbones down, they Anchor at last in the nearest town

And their Fam'ly's so glad they are safe and hearty that they make hot cocoa and have a party.

TO EACH AND ALL—MERRY CHRISTMAS

And now to dinner. The first item on the agenda is soup. I don't care what else you do, soup is good, soup is proper, soup is liked and soup is soup. Only it isn't just that. It has to be the right soup—light and hot—to precede a Christmas dinner, and here's one. I don't claim there aren't others, but here's one of the best. So let's begin.

TOMATO CONSOMMÉ

Add 4 cups tomato juice to 2 cans condensed consommé. Season with 4 whole cloves, 8 peppercorns, ½ bay leaf, ½ teaspoon salt, a little basil, 1 small onion, chopped, a few celery tops and parsley sprigs. Simmer 30 minutes. Strain through cheesecloth. Reheat and serve with a slice of orange in each bowl of soup.

The roasted bird. The size of your turkey is a matter personal and private to you. Depends on the size of your family, and isn't, as some have intimated, decided by the size of your platter. Anyway, select a bird of limited summers, with a tender and yielding breastbone, plump and aristocratic-looking, one that has shown ambition to shine in his destined role on your table.

Stuff both breast and inside of the turkey with a good stuffing (never call it "dressing"). I like my oysters in a scallop or a stew. To put them in a stuffing is like using pearls on your garters. But you can't go wrong with sausage, and my choice would be a sausage stuffing.

SAUSAGE STUFFING FOR TURKEY

Pull bread crumbs from 1½ loaves unsliced stale bread. Spread out on tray and let stand overnight. Add 1 pound bulk pork sausage and mix well with the fingers so the sausage is evenly distributed through the bread. Crush enough crisp rye wafers to make 1 cup and add to the bread and sausage. Toss in ¾ cup chopped onion, 2 teaspoons salt and 2 teaspoons sage. You won't need butter. The sausage fat will do the larding in the baking. This amount will stuff a 16–18-pound bird. For a roast chicken or small turkey, halve the quantities. I like to make up a whole lot of stuffing and pack what doesn't go in the turkey in a glass baking dish. When breakfast time rolls round, slice your stuffing and fry it in butter or salt-pork fat. It's dandy.

Ready for the roaster. The turkey, having been sewed up and trussed up, is rubbed well, all over, with melted butter or margarine, dredged with flour and put in a roaster. The oven should be at 475° F., and the bird allowed to brown, turning it so it will brown all around, as you need to. Then cover and reduce the heat to 350° F. and finish roasting. Baste with melted butter or margarine and hot water, half and half, from time to time as the roasting goes on. It takes about 3 hours for a 10–12-pound turkey, an extra hour for 16 pounds, but try it with a fork and be sure it is very tender. Underdone turkey is one of life's major disappointments. And no one should be disappointed.

If you don't want to watch and baste, you may wrap your stuffed turkey lengthwise in an 18" sheet of aluminum foil before putting in the roaster. There won't be as much gravy-making material in the pan, but other advantages make up for this disadvantage. For a 12-pound turkey, roast for 2 hours and 15 minutes at 400° F. Remove the foil, lower the heat and continue roasting for 1 hour at 350° F. Turn the turkey twice during the last hour for even browning.

• • •

Sweet and low. That's onions. Do not pay any mind to my English. It's as it is, no better. But I am a lover of onions. Many people are enamored of carrots. Why, I do not know. A carrot is, I admit, a so-called blessing. I'm an onion fan, myself, but this is a very good way of having both carrots and onions for your dinner. It's a pretty dish, too, and tastes as good as it looks.

CREAMED ONIONS WITH CARROTS

Peel and cook 3 pounds white onions in boiling salted water until tender. Drain well. Melt 6 tablespoons butter or margarine, blend in 6 tablespoons flour, 2 teaspoons salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Stir until smooth. Gradually add 2 cups light cream and 1 cup milk. Cook over low heat, stirring frequently, until thick and smooth. Add 1½ cups coarsely grated raw carrots and cook slowly 3 minutes. Mix with the cooked onions. Add 1 tablespoon butter and heat all together thoroughly. Taste for seasoning. It may need a little more salt and pepper.

• • •

Cranberry jelly helps. To keep the appetite more or less expectant under the assault of turkey and trimmings, cranberry sauce or jelly is a must. Cranberries are a turkey's natural friend and relative. No matter what other relishes you serve, Christmas dinner wouldn't be the same without cranberries. You can, of course, buy cranberry jelly or make it this way:

CRANBERRY JELLY

Add 2 cups cold water to 1 pound (4 cups) fresh cranberries. Bring to a boil and cook until all the skins pop open. Strain through a fine sieve to remove skins and seeds, but press pulp through with the juice. Add 2 cups sugar to the strained cranberry pulp and stir until the sugar is dissolved. Bring the mixture to a boil and cook rapidly for about 5–8 minutes, stirring occasionally, until a spoonful sets on a cold plate. This needs watching. Skim and pour into a mold. Chill until firm. Makes about 1 quart.

• • •

Celery in a salad. I'm sure neither Napoleon nor George Washington had anything to do with the salad we nominate for our Christmas dinner. The victor was no doubt some good cook who achieved a personal triumph with this dish. At least I first ate it in the home of a famous woman who had, among other qualities, a talent for producing fine food. And since celery, raw or cooked, goes with either turkey or chicken, include it in your meal in some fashion if you prefer a simpler salad than this.

CELERY VICTOR

Remove the outer stalks from 8 bunches celery. Cook the celery hearts in consommé or

Keeping Warm

By Herbert Merrill

What if the laughing creek is bound
In ice and night is bitter black?
The mole is snug beneath the ground,
The mouse is warm in his haystack.

What if the pond is turned to stone
And fields are crusted white and chill?
Beneath the snow the seeds are sown,
Patient as time and living still.

And what if winter stalks the house
And whistles down the fireplace?
We sit here snug as mole and mouse,
With springtime smiling on your face.

WESSON DE LUXE FRUITCAKE

Luscious loaves or festive cupcakes*—so easy to mail

Mix together . . 1 cup WESSON OIL
1½ cups brown sugar (packed in cup)
4 whole eggs
Beat vigorously with spoon or electric mixer for 2 minutes.
Sift together . . 2 cups sifted GOLD MEDAL Flour
*1 tsp. double-action baking powder
*2 tsp. salt
2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. allspice
1 tsp. cloves
Stir into Wesson Oil mixture alternately with 1 cup fruit juice (pineapple or orange for light cake)
Mix . . . . . 1 cup more sifted GOLD MEDAL Flour
into . . . . . 1 cup shaved citron
1 cup chopped candied pineapple
1½ cups whole candied cherries
1 cup raisins
1 cup chopped figs
3 cups coarsely chopped nuts
Pour batter over fruit, mixing thoroughly.
Line with brown paper 2 loaf pans,* 8½ x 4½ x 2½-in. Pour the batter into the pans. Place a pan of water on the lower oven rack. Bake cakes 2½ to 3 hours in slow oven (275°). After baking, let cakes stand 15 minutes before removing from pans. Cool thoroughly on racks without removing paper. Cover and store to ripen. If cakes are to be kept for a long time, remove paper and wrap in fruit-juice-soaked cloths. Store in a cool dry place. When ready to use, glaze and decorate.

GLAZE: Combine 2 tbsp. brown sugar, 1 tbsp. corn syrup, 2 tbsp. water and bring to boil; boil 2 minutes. Brush over cake. Decorate with candied cherries as shown.

NOTES: To measure raisins, cut-up candied peel, candied cherries, etc., ½ lb. equals 1½ cups; ¾ lb. equals ¾ cups.
*Or divide batter: bake half in loaf as above and bake remainder in 12 paper baking cups placed in muffin tins . . . bake at 275° for 1 hr. and 15 min.
If you use Gold Medal Self-Rising Flour omit baking powder and salt.

BETTY CROCKER'S CHERRY CORDIAL CHIFFON CAKE

Delicate and richly moist—another triumph for Softasilk Cake Flour and Wesson Oil

Preheat oven (see pan sizes and corresponding temperatures below). Sift an ample amount of flour onto a square of paper. Chop nuts very fine; slice and chop well drained maraschino cherries very fine (see quantities below).

STEP 1—Measure (level measurements throughout) and sift together into mixing bowl
2¼ cups sifted SOFTASILK Cake Flour (spoon lightly, don't pack)
1½ cups sugar
3 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
Make well and add in order
½ cup WESSON OIL
5 unbeaten egg yolks (medium)
¼ cup maraschino cherry juice
½ cup cold water
1 tsp. vanilla
Beat until smooth with spoon, or beat with electric mixer on medium speed for 1 minute.

STEP 2—Measure into large mixing bowl . . . 1 cup egg whites (7 or 8)
½ tsp. cream of tartar
Beat until whites form very stiff peaks by hand, or with electric mixer on high speed for 3 to 5 minutes. DO NOT UNDERBEAT. Egg whites are stiff enough when rubber scraper drawn through them leaves a clean path.

STEP 3—Pour egg yolk mixture gradually over beaten egg whites—gently folding with rubber scraper just until blended. DO NOT STIR.

Mix together . . . ½ cup very thinly sliced, finely chopped, well drained maraschino cherries
½ cup very finely chopped nuts
Sprinkle over top of batter gently folding in with a few strokes. Pour into ungreased pan immediately.

BAKE: Tube pan, 10 x 4-in.—325° (slow moderate oven)—65 to 70 minutes. Oblong pan, 13 x 9½ x 2-in.—350° (moderate oven)—45 to 50 minutes . . . or until top springs back when lightly touched.

Immediately turn pan upside down, placing tube part over neck of funnel or bottle, or resting edges of oblong pan on 2 other pans. Let hang, free of table, until cold. Loosen from sides and tube with spatula. Turn pan over and hit edge sharply on table to loosen. Frost with White Mountain Icing.

CAUTION: (1) Cherries must be very well drained and very finely chopped or they will sink to the bottom. (2) If you live at altitude over 2500 feet look on the folder inside the Softasilk package for Chiffon Cake recipe adjustments.

WHITE MOUNTAIN ICING . . . Stir until well blended in a small saucepan ½ cup sugar, ¼ cup white corn syrup, 2 tbsp. water. Boil rapidly to 242° (mixture spins a 6 to 8-in. thread or a few drops form a firm ball when dropped into cold water). When mixture begins to boil, start beating ¼ cup egg whites (2 small). Beat until stiff enough to hold a peak. Pour hot syrup slowly in a thin steady stream into beaten egg whites, beating constantly with electric or rotary beater until mixture stands in very stiff peaks. Blend in 1 tsp. vanilla.

Christmas pudding. Plum pudding is as important a part of the holiday dinner as the lights on the Christmas tree. It should be full of "plums," richly spiced, and one that you can't resist after you've eaten the drumstick and two helpings of stuffing. We all have memories of puddings past and we can dream of those to be. So here's one more to add to the list that's already long:

CHRISTMAS PUDDING

Mix together 2 cups seedless raisins, ½ cup finely chopped citron, the grated rind of 1 orange and 1 lemon, 1 large apple, peeled, cored and chopped, ½ cup sliced glacéed cherries, ¼ cup chopped pitted dates, ½ cup orange juice and 1 cup orange marmalade. Let it stand overnight. Beat 3 eggs until very light. Add ½ cup sugar and 1 cup molasses gradually. Then add 1½ cups packaged fine dry bread crumbs, 1 cup finely chopped beef suet, 1 cup chopped walnuts and the fruits you soaked overnight. Sift 1 cup flour with 1 teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon baking soda, 1 teaspoon baking powder, 1 teaspoon cinnamon, ½ teaspoon allspice and ½ teaspoon cloves. Stir into the pudding mixture and pour into greased and floured pudding molds. If you use 1 big mold, steam 4–5 hours, depending on size. We like to use two 1-quart molds and steam 3 hours. In this way you can have one pudding for the dinner and one extra for second helpings or other entertaining during the holidays. Puddings may be steamed days ahead, cooled, left in the molds and steamed to reheat Christmas Day. This type of pudding must be really hot to be at its best. Serve with hard or foamy sauce. Garnish with glacéed fruits if you like.

Hard sauce is so called because it's soft. Things are often called by contradictory names, and hard sauce is an example. Make it and prove the point. It's eaten with plum pudding and other things. It ought to be flavored highly. Admired extravagantly. Eaten freely.

HARD SAUCE

Cream 1 cup butter or margarine with 1 cup superfine sugar until fluffy. Add ¼ teaspoon vanilla and the grated rind of 1 orange—about 4 teaspoons. Mix well and chill. Serve with a sprinkle of shredded orange peel over the top.

The old order changeth—yes, but we ought to be able to preserve beauty and dignity, and the sense of service and manners, things that have come very slowly, and can be made to vanish very fast if we aren't set on preserving them somehow.

—JOHN GALSWORTHY.

As a Christmas present to you, I wish I could have taken you all with me when I went up to my home town in Vermont. It was a little late, so the leaves had begun to turn and against the virgin forests of pine and hemlock, a picture spread its canvas before eyes bred to stone and brick, and the rooftops that are the ultimate lesson in monotony. You scarcely drive two miles that you don't glimpse a silver ribbon of river down below. A piece that maybe God left over when He cut the pattern of lace and brocade to dress the ineffable beauty of Vermont. And in her hair He nestled a diamond locket set with the star called Venus. This picture, if I could paint it, would be my Christmas card to you. The memory of those lofty mountains and peaceful valleys, where faith and truth and beauty abide, is in my mind as I wish you again the old, old wish—Merry Christmas. Merry Christmas to each and all. With loving thoughts all through the days that are gone and those (D.V.) that are to come.

WHEN A WOMAN MAKES UP HER MIND

long before the collapse comes depends most of all upon how long it takes the American woman to make up her mind to knock over the monstrous edifice. This is even more true now than in 1890 because the American woman today has the vote, a wider awareness of her world and, most importantly, freedom from the shibboleths which ordained that she should show no interest in public affairs.

As a newspaper editor, I have spent much time for the past 20 years in what is called, sometimes derisively, crusading. I know from experience that crusades can be successful only when the women get stirred up, and that the aid of twenty women who believe in the objective is more useful than resolutions of support passed by all the men's civic clubs in town.

Scores of examples, some with national meaning, come readily to mind. The virtual eradication of lynching in the South has not been brought about by the passage of more laws, but principally because the women of the South organized antilynching groups within and outside the churches and shamed the Southern male conscience. Women voters were the most telling factor in the defeat of the Hague machine in New Jersey. In the spring of 1951, women joined with men in Lake Charles, Louisiana, to secure, by personal investigation, evidence of widespread organized gambling for presentation to a grand jury. In our own little city, I like to boast that my newspaper has never lost a campaign for community betterment. We have contributed to the defeats of politicians whose alliance with the back-country underworld differed from the union of Tammany and Costello only in the size of the take. We have helped win reforms in school systems and city planning, successfully sought adequate educational, medical and recreational facilities for all groups in our population, and in general have tried to build a community of good will and political decency. In every campaign, the women have been responsible for the success achieved.

It may be that this is just small-town stuff, but I do not think it should be so dismissed. Every community is the nation in microcosm. If the women of Greenville, Mississippi, can rouse 80 per cent of our voters to support new school and swimming-pool and hospital bond issues, and turn out to defeat an underworld-backed candidate for sheriff, their metropolitan sisters can do the same. If the women of Lake Charles, Louisiana, have the courage to gather proof of wide-open gambling, so can the women of Miami and San Francisco and Chicago and wherever else the rackets flourish.

But across America, not enough women are convinced of their political importance or of the relation between passive citizenship and the present danger to free and honest government. It seems to me that too many American women welcome, or at least accept, the admonition in the antiquated book of etiquette. Too many American women prefer canasta to political housecleaning, both as a personal activity and as a conversational topic. Their choice makes it easier for the enemies of law and democracy, and harder for their own sons and daughters in a world where the lights of free, lawful society shine feebly.

For those lights are not endangered by force alone. They can flicker out, also, in the darkness of neglect. THE END been wrecked by underdone fried chicken than by any other single article of food, unless it was overdone corn on the cob. Chicken must be rolled in salted flour, browned quickly in deep butter, steamed slowly for one hour (fifty-five minutes wouldn't do it), hot water having been added, then cooked down low with the lid off until brown. This would produce chicken which could easily be cut with a fork, and with a flavor which people talked about in the naves of churches and on the eves of national crises.

Not only did mother make a rite of frying chicken; she could roast or bake it to a sort of unearthly perfection. Mother's roast chicken (trickling fat at its seams and drenched in its own juices), lifted from the roaster and heaved gently onto the platter, was something to make you tremble with awe.

Nor was fowl mother's only meaty triumph. If you had the good fortune or shrewd judgment to stumble into our kitchen on certain snowy winter evenings along about five o'clock, you would sniff the aroma of mother's spareribs broiling merrily, and you would never be the same again; for even if you never learned the secret of broiling them as mother broiled them, you would never be able to live down the memory of that moment. Corn bread and French fries and plenty of snappy applesauce cooked down with lemon made the meal you would have eaten with us that evening, mother having slipped in another plate at the table.

Pork chops, too, became something more than dabs of meat when mother cooked them. These, having first been rolled in salted flour, were cooked in a deep skillet so that the fat could occasionally bubble across them even before they were turned. They were fried quickly to a rich brown, turned and browned on the other side, steamed gently for twenty minutes, and then lifted deftly to the platter. With pork chops you had the same snappy applesauce you used with spareribs, but the potatoes were mashed, whipped to a creamy lightness, instead of French-fried (sometimes creamed hominy was substituted), and there were either home-canned peas or home-canned tiny green beans. Usually the creamed hominy—and mother's vegetables were creamed, not white-sauced—was reserved for sausage meals, but occasionally we persuaded mother to serve it with pork chops also. Sometimes for variation we had, instead of applesauce, rhubarb, home-canned by mother, with little cubes of pineapple floating around in it. Rhubarb, mother insisted, always needed a dash of pineapple. Fresh pineapple, of course, cooked down and added to the rhubarb when it was canned.

ROASTS too—pork, beef or lamb—were mother's pride and delight. She preferred beef, insisting that it not only produced more red blood cells, but kept down tonsillitis much more successfully than pork or lamb. With roasts you had hot biscuits or homemade rolls or homemade bread. Mother, maintaining that she knew her limitations, did not bake her own bread, but believing firmly in the superiority of home-baked over store-baked bread, bought ours each week from a dear little old lady who lived at the end of our street. Gravy, cream or pan, went with the roast; and potatoes, onions, turnips and carrots, which had been stashed in the roaster around the meat and allowed to grow tender and brown and juicily delicious, were piled onto the platter around it. With what torture I lived through the asking of the blessing and looked up nervously to see whether that specially browned potato would go onto my sister's plate or mine!

Although mother didn't go in for baking bread in the ordinary sense, of what an imposing list of quick breads, hot cakes and muffins she was mistress! Her nut bread, baked in small loaves, was cut into thin slices, buttered well to the edges, and made into dainty sandwiches. These, eaten in unladylike stacks, with a cup of creamy hot chocolate, were our favorite after-school lunch. Wheat muffins, corn muffins, bran muffins, all a golden brown, were flipped joyously from muffin pans and eaten hot, drenched in butter, with meals, or cold with a slice of butter anchored securely inside and blackberry jam or grape marmalade oozing out the sides, for snacks. With these you drank a tall glass of milk.

MOTHER'S corn muffins were good, but her corn griddlecakes were something bordering upon the miraculous and an experience not often vouchsafed to mortal man. I have never eaten any like them anywhere at any time. I have no idea, other than the type of corn meal, what went into them. I only know that when they were lifted from the griddle, fragrant, thin, brown, with lacy edges, spread with soft home-churned butter and freshly made plum conserve, they were like nothing I have ever experienced in this world or hope to experience in the world to come. When I eat the travesty on corn bread that is frequently poked at me today by certain undiscerning waitresses, I wonder how they can face me with equanimity.

The only clue I have to mother's corncakes is the kind of corn meal she used. The meal, of course, must be white, mother insisted, never yellow, which well-meaning but misguided Northerners used; and must unfailingly be water-ground. None of that dreadful steel-cut stuff, abhorrent to the palate of a connoisseur of corn bread.

Mother was likewise modestly famous for her steamed brown bread. On days when it was being made we rushed home after school, scorning butterscotch sundaes in the drugstore as something we could have any day, whereas mother's brown bread was infrequent and of short duration. Brown bread today is frequently spread with cream cheese and served as sandwiches with tea. Mother's brown bread could stand on its own merits. You put butter, and nothing but butter, on it; and you ate it because it was good, and not merely because it would keep your stomach from gnawing.

The mention of brown bread brings me, of course, to baked beans. Boston baked beans. I grew up, an unsuspecting little Midwesterner, on heavenly Boston baked beans, large navy beans cooked down to mealy tenderness in ham fat and baked in brown sugar and molasses under strips of bacon.

Years later, when I first visited Boston and was served those small pellets which Bostonians know as baked beans, I thought there must have been some mistake. I went from restaurant to coffee shop up and down the streets of Boston, my dismay mounting as nothing resembling Midwestern Boston baked beans made their appearance. I have since learned that Boston Boston baked beans are not even a reasonable facsimile of Midwestern Boston baked beans, and my heart aches for cheated Bostonians.

The memory of mother's food is endless: her sugar cookies, her cherry cobbler, her steamed dumplings, her quince jelly, her green salads, her homemade ice cream. Ice cream. I can well imagine what mother's horror would be today at the stuff people make in electric refrigerators and call ice cream. No child, mother said, should be denied the joy of settling down in a corner on Sunday afternoon with the ice-cream dasher.

Poets, prophets and just plain people, mother affirmed, need food, delicious food, and plenty of it. When the Lord said, "When I was hungry, you gave me food," He meant, said mother, good food. THE END

To feel sorry for oneself is one of the most disintegrating things the individual can do to himself.

Color-scheming the old furnishings with budget-priced fabrics brings them into close harmony with the new gray rug.

This is the living room that was treated to a new rug.

A rug on a budget

By HENRIETTA MURDOCK Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

THERE'S no doubt that a beautiful rug gives an air of luxury as well as comfort to any room. But sometimes we long to do over a living room, and can't stretch the budget to include both a new rug and new furniture. Here is what one woman did:

She decided to splurge on a new rug and economize closely elsewhere. She used her old furniture, freshly slip-covered, a few family antiques and a homemade magazine table; sheer curtains—dyed muslin at 30 cents a yard—instead of expensive draperies; and budget-priced materials for the slip covers. With these economies she managed to save the price of a new rug.

Brush up on floor-covering styles and developments before you buy your rug. Look for the name of a reliable manufacturer and then ask questions about the weaves and textures with which you may not be familiar. Expect to pay around $145 for a 9′ x 12′ size wool or blend rug and choose a color you really like, even though you may have nothing to go with it right then.

To save time and money with your budget decorating, check over these helpful pointers:

out, decide on your colors. In planning the sample room photographed, we chose this year's fashion colors, charcoal gray and watermelon pink. Keeping in mind the gray rug and lighter gray walls, we made numerous tryouts for the prettiest pink to go with them. Then, taking along our samples of these colors, we went shopping for slip-covering materials and fabric for curtains. On this first trip, get samples only; don't buy unless you are sure.

The next step... After the furniture is arranged, decide where to use the new colors by laying the samples right onto the sofa and chairs. Change them about until you have a pleasing balance of design and plain colors; usually some of each on opposite sides of the room.

We always make a simple work sheet when decorating a do-over room, writing down things as we decide them and referring to it as we go along. This helps keep the new picture in mind and leads to the next step.

Slip-cover and curtain details . . . These are homemade and the pink covers are a surprise—made of washable-cotton dress piqué, costing about $1.25 a yard. The piqué doesn't wrinkle, seams beautifully and has an exquisite texture. The chintz covers on armchair and sofa are fitted snugly and tacked at strategic points to give a trim upholstered look. The variety and colorings of chintz and other cotton prints are unlimited. They are priced from 79 cents to $1.75 a yard, and you can easily find a combination of your scheme colors, in a design you like. Our sheer pink curtains are the very cheapest grade of industrial muslin, dyed pink. This muslin is on sale in the domestics department of dry-goods stores almost everywhere.

In quarreling, the truth is always lost. —SYRUS.

Penny savers . . . Scout dress-fabric counters for suitable cotton materials marked down. Denim, piqué, Indian head and cotton corduroy all make beautiful slip covers. Cheesecloth, theatrical gauze, voile and thin muslin make charmingly sheer curtains if dyed to match your color scheme and styled with plenty of fullness.

Use regular oil paint to do over your lamp shades; make colored paper jackets for the shabby books, and take down any pictures that don't go with your new colors. If you do all these things, you will have a prettier room and a better-matched scheme than if you had bought everything new.

THEY WOULDN'T BELIEVE ME

Doug looked at the lumpy figure, the sagging skirt, the home-knit jumper, the big rough hands and tear-swollen face. He'd seen them all before. It was these back-country girls who kept on hoping long after the letters stopped. A betrothal was as binding as a marriage in their world, and they were used to waiting, and to male whims. Her hair hung lank and, remembering the flying locks of the girls at home, he was suddenly sick for a glimpse of those carefree girls.

Doug stood up courteously. "Fräulein, I regret ——" he said.

It was as bad as he expected. Worse, because she opened up the nice old chest—"The wedding chest of my mother. Of the mother of my grandmother"—and showed him the country linen saved, heaven knew how, through the war; the homemade thread lace and bits of embroidery. "Mein Haus," she sobbed over it, "für mein Haus."

Ex-Wac Jones was bawling, too, by the time it was all over, so he sent them both in a taxi to her apartment until he could arrange to send the girl home. He walked out to the curb with them and gave the porter a hand with the chest.

"Stay all day. Stay forever," he roared, slamming the taxi door.

He stamped back, saying "Next" over his shoulder as he went through the outer office. This would set them all off, even the new girls up for their first quizzing. He braced himself behind his desk and, at the polite knock, rapped out a "Herein" that would have done credit to a Storm Trooper. He shuffled papers a minute to make it more impressive, looked up—and his jaw dropped.

For there stood exactly the kind of girl he'd been dreaming of: shining blond hair; clear gray eyes with brains behind them; a good black dress, worn, of course, but close-fitted, elegant; a flat black velvet bow set just right instead of a hat.

"Good morning, Herr Konsul," she said in English. "How kind you were to that poor Mädchen."

Doug got his mouth closed again, but for a moment no words would come out of it.

"I am really sorry for you at this work," she said. "Perhaps you are not yet ready for me? I give you my papers and wait again outside."

"Not at all, Fräulein," Doug said, fixing his eye on the American flag opposite and speaking with tremendous dignity. "Just be seated."

She did so easily, and waited without fidgeting. Doug's brain began to click again weakly, and to give it time to warm up to full revs, he glanced down the forms she handed him. They proved as different as the girl herself. NAME: Elna Ehrnstrom. BORN: Switzerland, Zurich. FATHER: archaeologist, retired. MOTHER: deceased. MOTHER'S MAIDEN NAME: (oh-oh, here it came) Von Meltzke. One of the old royal houses and big guns under the Hohenzollerns. They'd thrown in their lot with Hitler and ridden high—got back their own estates, plus a lot of other people's, in the south down near ——

His eye skimmed on. FORMER RESIDENCES: Wow! She'd lived all over Europe and plenty of Asia and North Africa till the war. Couldn't have been in her teens even. Well, archaeology could account for that. Or it could be a blind for something else with that family hookup. But except for the carefully enumerated addresses, and the present address, that was her whole story. No Nazi affiliations. No anti-Nazi. No youth group. No Gymnasium. No university. No record of "Werk," government or otherwise. Barest papers he'd ever handled for anybody in the Hitler Jugend age span. Something phony, obviously.

He tried not to see her slender silhouette across the desk, her profile delicate and vulnerable, without the fixed mask he'd learned to recognize. Just another smart angle, he warned himself, and it was his job to track down angles, because the girls the Occupation troops harried the immigration offices and the steamship lines about, kept the cables hot and the air mails flying, were ten to one girls he couldn't pass.

Doug felt like a housemother every time he faced an angry Yank and said, "Look, sergeant, you don't want to marry this girl because ——" Some of the purplest words in the Occupation vocabulary had been hurled at him in the course of these interviews, and Doug couldn't blame the men.

But Doug knew too much about these young born-and-bred totalitarians to let them slip through his fingers. There were troubles enough at home without them, because if they were lying about their Nazi affiliations it was dollars to doughnuts they were still in them, up to the neck. The Deutscher Bloc, or the "Society for Those Harmed by the Occupation Forces," or any other front whooping it up for Teutonic resurgence. All the same old guff. Doug knew where to listen. He still had a finger in Intelligence and it was his business to get around. He'd seen plenty of good-looking girls in the process, too—the Hitler health Kult had seen to that—but none with this pure, fine-drawn beauty, this innate ——

Oh, get on with it, Herr Konsul, Doug told imself, looking up from her papers to her ace. An error, because the correct questions e meant to ask oozed back into jelly. She as speaking in a singularly clear, beautiful oice with just enough accent to charm.

"As you see, we are recently from our ome in Oberammergau. For me all was arranged by the authorities of that area, complete and correct as you see. I go by the eptember-fourth sailing if you can arange—even postpone to the next September eparture if necessary in order that ——"

Doug flipped back the pages. Who was the icky guy? John Alling Fraser, Lake Forest, linois. OCCUPATION: student. INTENTIONS ILED: When? At the date, Doug's eyes ulged: 1945. Over two years ago. She must e just crazy about Student Fraser—not. Or as she up to something after all?

"Postpone your sailing again, Fräulein hrnstrom, when all formalities are conuded? When you have waited already so uch longer than the official permission me? What has—ah—detained you so long Germany?"

She caught his tone, and you could see her it on dignity like a cloak. "It was my other," she said. "She was dying, we knew, hen John received his orders home so soon ter we met. At that time, of course, regulaons forbade our marriage before he went. nd he knew I must stay as long as—as my other needed me."

He believed her. That sudden quiver like a ild's across her chin. The case was closed yway. Fini. So what had she come here r? Fraser's bond was posted, Army and oreign Service satisfied. Ticket paid for at remerhaven. It wasn't his responsibility, d if this girl wasn't on the level, he didn't ant to know it.

"These are all in order," he said. "You ve only to present them to ——"

"I know," she said. Dark lashes swept up, expected, exciting with her pale blond ir, and showed a pair of eyes that would op a klieg light. Gray, deep and strong with ack rays out from the pupil through the s. They were like—like —— "I understand all for myself," she was saying. "But rrive so early this morning to ask that my her go also by my sailing."

Here comes the joker, tapped Doug's brain. e returned her gaze coldly—he hoped. Your father himself must ——"

"Oh, Herr Konsul, but see this!" She ackled a fresh cablegram at him. "See this hich offers to my father the post of travelg lecturer under the combined universities —— Read. Read," she was urging. "'Assured State Department clearance in time college openings September. Et cetera, et cetera, follows air mail ——'"

It sounded all right, but ——

"It means we can, can we not, my father and I, go together by my sailing next month? I will sleep in the deck chair. I will ——"

"Next month? But, Fräulein, even if your father's papers come through from Washington in time, even if he's cleared that fast by Counter-Intelligence ——"

"Yes. Yes. That is understood. He must be quickly found a civilian above reproach and the papers must come quickly as promised. But it is you, I am told, who has discretion to decide certain sailings in order of importance. I come to ask this precedence of you so that we may leave together if his papers can be completed in time."

"Fräulein, the sailings are ——"

"I know how long-planned they are, but I have waited, have I not, long enough for two? And my father goes to an important post, to an education only he can give in many of your universities. The letters will come through Herr Professor Halvorson at the Oriental Institute at Chicago" (she pronounced it Chick-ago) "where my father's work is well known. Professor Halvorson is our old friend. Indeed, it is through his letters I have met my affianced, by his sending John to learn of our welfare."

Well, some guys have all the luck, Doug thought, watching the slim forward tilt of her body as she told her story. If he'd been Student Fraser, he'd have —— She was looking at him inquiringly, so he'd missed something while he explored this pleasant possibility. He cleared his throat and took official cover.

"H'm. Hurum. If your father is a resident here he himself should come ——"

Elna bent more ardently forward in her eagerness to explain. Herr Professor Ehrnstrom had been ill with an influenza, very near a pneumonia. "It was the long sorrow of my mother's dying and knowing, without so-saying, now we too must part, perhaps forever. But he will be well now. If we may voyage together, the sea air, the good food, to be happy. Herr Konsul, I come to your office this morning to beg you arrange us to go to America together. I beg you, please. Bitte. Bitte schön."

Bitte schön. She makes it sound like bells. Doug thought wildly, clutching at the last remnants of his consular sense. He must have missed his aim, though, because he heard himself saying, "If the Herr Professor is well enough, an interview at home would save time."

"They were all out of squash, so instead I got corn, turkey legs, sweet potatoes, celery, stuffed olives, potato chips . . ."

"Yes. Yes. He is from the bed but not yet from the house. If you would come, it is a great favor. We are in lodgings, but I can give you real coffee from our food packages. Could you—is it possible you could come this afternoon? At five, perhaps?"

Doug burbled something that indicated he could make it, escorting her to the outer door, and if she hadn't stopped there with a smiling "Auf Wiedersehen" he'd have floated on after her, down the hall, out the building, and into the great blue yonder. Walking back through the afterglow of that smile, he regarded the growing line of civilians benched in the reception room and couldn't stick it.

"Come back tomorrow," he said, and without a word they gathered up their papers and filed out. One good thing about Germans, they did what they were told. If you were an official, you didn't even have to explain, but Doug always did anyway. "Sorry. Emergency investigation," he said. And got on the telephone.

He'd done it all right. He told Counter-Intelligence to put full speed on the case, which they did, having a good many past reasons to respect his requests, and by mid-afternoon he'd got the word back from Document Center in Berlin on Herr Professor Karl Erich Ehrnstrom. And the word was bad. Also it was odd.

Which of course was why, instead of sending word the deal was off, pending investigation, he showed up at the boardinghouse on the stroke of five. And why, when Elna met him, looking like a—like a yellow rose in the overstuffed pension parlor, he found himself wafting up the stairs after her into the Ehrnstrom sitting room and bowing solicitously over a frail knee-blanketed figure with a halo of white hair (astounding how Hitler got hold of these vague, dreamy types) in response to Elna's "This is the kind Herr Konsul, father."

THE kind Herr Konsul tried for a business opening, but the Herr Professor beat him to it. In near-Oxford English.

"Let me speak, Herr Campbell, before my so-persuasive daughter takes command, because I knew when I found my papers gone out with her this morning what she would be about: asking that I go with her to America at once. Obviously it is impossible."

"Well, let's see what we can do," Doug heard his voice saying heartily. He must be crazy. "Even if your clearance doesn't come through in time for the fourth, the next sailing is only ——"

It was a mistake about the professor's vagueness. "Not one more boat my daughter waits," he said, striking the chair arm. "She goes now, after long delays, to her marriage and if it is to be that I may follow her, I will then find her already established in America, a happy junge Frau, to greet me." He looked fondly over his glasses at Elna. "That is what I most desire."

Doug didn't care much for it. "Nice if you could go together, though," he said, trying not to register the thought that it would be even nicer if they should be delayed together. His voice was still booming on of its own volition. "So let's get going at this end. Just in case," it said.

The beams of joy, gratitude and conspiracy which Elna had been raying to him over her father's shoulder now approached his immediate vicinity with a coffee cup and he reeled under the impact. Get a grip on yourself, Doug old kid, he warned his swooning faculties.

"Your wife, Herr Ehrnstrom, was ——" he began, and in the little hush that followed he felt sorrow brush the room. The professor picked up the words gently, but when he spoke it was in ready-made phrases as if he had answered the question many times before.

"YES, my wife was Katerina von Meltzke, a great family of the old days, but like many others it became much divided under the Hohenzollerns between militarists and liberals. Needless to say, she was of the latter persuasion. The pro-Prussian members, natürlich, regained both power and possessions under the Nazis since they loved both fighting and intrigue, but for my wife's father the ruin was complete. His sons, even his Germany, were dead, and the great inflation of the twenties took the last of his fortune before he, too, died in Switzerland. It was there I found my wife alone, young and penniless. We were content that my work kept us much abroad. We returned to Germany as seldom as possible and we kept no contact with the Von Meltzkes, from whom we were entirely estranged. This is easily proved." The scholarly glasses glinted parentally—almost grandparentally—at Elna again. He must have been years older than the penniless young Prinzessin. "We are accustomed, are we not, for many years to explain Mamachen's great relatives?"

Doug asked heavily, "You have not been connected with any one university for many years, Herr Ehrnstrom?"

"No. My work was more archaeological digging and research than teaching, although I was often called for a series of lectures to universities and academies that specialize in these ancient cultures: Oxford, Basle, and the antiquarian academies in Athens, Constantinople, Cairo and Paris. Though never yet in America unless it is to be that I go now."

His smile had Elna's clear candor, so rare in this angry opinionated land, and Doug turned away from it, only to encounter the gaze of an extraordinarily good-looking young lieutenant in a silver frame on the desk—Student Fraser, of course—which he liked even less.

"And during the war you did no teaching in Germany? Nothing all those years?"

The narrow, wise face closed. "That is correct. I am in retirement completely at Oberammergau."

"I don't see how you managed that. How you avoided certain obligations. The universities under the Nazis ——"

"I had never held a chair in Germany. I am primarily an archaeologist, teaching only as explained, when called for lectures concerning my small specialty."

Doug had to whip himself to go on against the mild old voice, but the lieutenant's possessive smile from the desk helped. "And that is, precisely?"

"Sumerian and Babylonian cuneiform inscriptions," the Herr Doktor supplied dryly. "So you see it did not much enter the Nazi regime."

"Except for your monograph, Dawn of Teutonic Superiority," Doug said, springing it. "Document Center in Berlin has a copy of the little job you did for the Ministry of Propaganda, something about the Babylonians and Assyrians being conquered by Aryans and becoming the true ancestors of the Germans." Doug's voice took on authority with anger. "It is ——"

The furtive look Doug had been dreading, the inward fanatic look he had seen disfigure other fine, thin, scholarly faces, did not appear. Instead came a crack of laughter, surprisingly hearty from that frail frame.

"It is completely ridiculous, eh?" The professor said. "Ach, das Goebbels, he would swallow anything!"

"How you have found that one thin pamphlet when so few were made!" cried Elna gaily. "I hope you Americans search out everything so well as this. Was it not cleverly done, my father's monograph? I told you he was a great scholar."

"Well, I ——" floundered Doug.

"More clever than the Ministry of Propaganda, at least," said the professor. "A small boast, perhaps, considering they were already far gone with their madness. But since you have discovered my nonsense book, I should tell you also it is partly through this that I was called seriously to lecture in America. Through this foolish hoax upon the Ahrenerbe, the Nazi Institute for Researches into Aryan Origins. Do you know of it?"

A good wife is God's sweetest smile from heaven. —JOSH BILLINGS.

Doug nodded soberly.

"Such nonsense I made those mutilated stones in Arabia to say! Because they tell of a tribe called Aryas which once ran over the Babylonians! 'Aryas' is the word the Ahrenerbe seize and eat. So to please them I trace the Aryas tribal wars with Assyrians, Persians, Syrians, to become always the conquerors, leading thus to the Huns and our Teutonic war destiny. In my house in the mountains making this hotchpotch, I have my one big laughter of the war. 'Perhaps I make it too much,' I say to my wife, 'even for these madmen.' But no, they look wise at where I ink in to complete those broken marks and pictographs, like a detective guessing the missing piece of burnt paper, and say together 'Ach, ja. It is our destiny.' To think, Herr Konsul"—the quiet voice grated—"these men had once been great scholars."

Doug could feel truth in the room, and relief swept over him. "So this was your only work for the party?"

"Actually, yes. True, they asked for more. Goebbels had a mad hope—you know that runes and cunes fascinated both him and Wulf, Hitler's astrologer—that some Norse runes, which are well known to scholars but have never been deciphered, might yield resemblance to Japanese ideograms and thus show the Japanese to be lost Aryans after all. I see you have heard of this foolishness also, Herr Campbell."

"I've read a lot of the junk," Doug agreed.

"But I did not do it. A second hoax could destroy our safe seclusion. Excuses were easy and the war near its end. I am guilty only of this one foolishness."

"So then," Elna broke in, her body alertly forward, her gray eyes deep as they had been that morning across the desk in his office, "when the war is over and we may write again, papa sent his pamphlet in a letter to our friend Professor Halvorson in America, who would most enjoy the joke."

Borden's Party Cheese Cake

-very special...to make for very special occasions!

PARTY CHEESE CAKE

Borden's Cream Cheese Makes It Extra-Light—Rich—Wonderful!

Butter an 8-inch spring form. Sprinkle bottom and sides with ⅔ cup rolled zwieback crumbs, pressing any extra crumbs evenly on bottom.

Soften three ½-lb. (or eight 3-oz.) packages Borden's Cream Cheese at room temperature. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla. Cream until fluffy.

Beat whites of 4 large or 5 medium eggs until foamy. Add 1 cup sugar in thirds, beating after each addition. Beat until stiff.

Fold egg whites gently into cheese. Pour into spring form. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 25 minutes (center will be soft). Cool.

Chill 3 to 4 hours. Remove from spring form. Top with fresh, frozen or canned fruits, if desired. Cut with an angel food cutter or thin sharp knife as the texture will be light and moist. Serves 12 to 14.

For a family dessert, use half the recipe and bake in 9-inch layer cake pan with removable bottom.

For desserts like this . . . for sandwiches and salads . . . you'll enjoy Borden's Cream Cheese! Made by a new formula, it has a fresh, delightful flavor . . . a light, fluffy texture.

Get the 3-oz. or 8-oz. package from the dairy case at your store. A special wrapper keeps the cheese fresh longer. A written guarantee assures you of full credit if you're not well pleased.

(Borden's Chive and Pimento Cream Cheese also in 3-oz. packages now!)

BORDEN'S FINE CHEESES

Folks who know cheese say "BORDEN'S, PLEASE!"

"Do you know Charles Halvorson?" queried Doctor Ehrnstrom. "A great archaeologist, I think your greatest. We have often dug together. But, jokes or no, see what comes of it. My friend Halvor laughs and gives it to the few others who would understand the broken inscriptions and laugh also. And from this I am asked to come to them for serious work. From this comes the cable my Elna brought you this morning. It is amusing, eh?"

It was plenty amusing. And if it was good enough for Charles Halvorson and the State Department, it was good enough for Consul Campbell. A good guffaw at Nazi gullibility in such rarefied circles would blow a healthy breeze through international scholarship. Doug drew a deep breath of that breeze himself. He wished the Counter-Intelligence boys joy of the immediate translation of the professor's masterpiece he'd ordered, and his grin at the thought of them struggling with runes and cuneiforms matched the doctor's.

Elna was collecting coffee cups, a suggestion that the call was ending, and Doug snatched for another topic of conversation. It was his plain duty to have all the answers on the Ehrnstroms ready if Washington wanted a snap decision.

"So Professor Halvorson reached you at Oberammergau. You lived there the entire war?"

"It was natural he should guess us to be there. We had always a small lodge at Ober for our returns to Germany, and Halvor had often his holidays with us there. Indeed, this is how my daughter's affianced, John Fraser, has come. Did she not tell you about it?"

He supposed he had to hear the saga sometime. "Yes?" he said with what enthusiasm he could rally, but the professor needed no urging.

"When Halvor heard a young acquaintance of his family was with the first Occupation troops into Ober, he sent a letter to present to us by hand if he can find us, and so send back direct news. John brings the letter. He finds my lovely Elna. And thus"—the professor indicated the photograph which stared handsomely back—"a very pretty romance. Nicht?"

Nicht, Doug decided. But it had served its purpose. Elna had settled again with some knitting. With care, he thought craftily, he ought to be able to keep the conversation going until it was time to suggest they drive out somewhere for dinner. He figured Elna would accept in order to further her cause, and the professor was in no shape for night air.

And so it turned out. After some more laughter at the Aryas myth, a little serious talk of newer and more menacing propaganda, and another brew of coffee, Doug felt enough groundwork had been laid to suggest dinner in the country and Elna, after a moment of surprise, stood up with the poised, graceful lightness that had bowled him over when she stepped into his office that morning.

"But it would be delicious to breathe country air again," she said gaily. "I have not been driving in a car—except only taxis—since how long, papa? You truly wish to do this, Herr Konsul?" He made it clear he did and she said, "Then I leave you a moment only," and ran out of the room, to reappear with her hair even more shining, the black velvet bow back in place, and over her shoulders a little black cape that was just right with the slim black dress. "Be very good, Papachen, and eat all from your tray when it arrives," she said, kissing his cheek and tucking the rug neatly back around his knees. She sparkled with excitement and pleasure.

It was a long drive to the inn, the farthest one Doug could think of. They had to dine and, as mein host wished the occupation regime to come often under his carved ceiling, they dined well. And they had to talk.

At first they discussed things at hand: details of Herr Ehrnstrom's transportation, food difficulties, Occupation problems. Then Elna brought up some reminiscences of John Alling Fraser, but Doug cut them as short as possible too.

"Now tell me of Chick-a-go," Elna next suggested.

"Terrible," said Doug.

There was a slight pause. "And Lake For-rest?" she asked.

"Suburb," Doug answered. His conscience roused itself and jabbed him with the memory of that fine blue lake front and the hospitality he had enjoyed there. "Not bad," he conceded grudgingly.

"Ah, well," said Elna. "And what is it, this fraternity house at your universities? John writes not much of his studies. His family is, you understand, of your business tradition, not scholarship. But what is this frat-club? Is it for beer or debate?"

"Beer," said Doug. See? he told his conscience. Fraser's just the first good-looking kid to cross her path. His conscience nodded and went back to sleep. "Your own family is quite a story; tell me some more about it," he said, partly to change the subject and partly to start up again the lovely cadence of her voice.

"It is as papa told you. One year we dig in Crete, another in Persia, or in Arabia. Often in Egypt. Once from some stones only he could decipher we find a complete great city in the desert. You have read of it, perhaps, not knowing it was papa who found it. Other times it is lecturing to students and to teachers, one never knew where next until the letter came to invite us. It was a fine life, Germans, French, English, Norwegians, Americans, all working together. Mamma went always also, with me a small papoose on her back, to be the gay one of the place, to bring there her pretty dresses and her music and her silver coffeepots. What do you call it that she brought?"

Any party which takes credit for the rain must not be surprised if its opponents blame it for the drought. —DWIGHT W. MORROW.

"Style? Graciousness?" suggested Doug, watching the candlelight play across Elna's neck and throat.

"Yes, both of those and yet more. She was everywhere loved and always remembered. Only when we must sometimes return home to Germany would they be sick in heart, papa seeing all so wrong from his history and mamma always so hating wars and war Kult from seeing her home, her family, all lost together. Imagine, Herr Konsul, she had four brothers all die the same year. Small wonder her mother soon followed. 'All to do again,' Mamachen would say when we would come back again. 'I pray not to see the end of this.' But she did see it. We all did see it. Though from high and far in the mountains, Gott sei Dank."

"That was at Ober?"

"Yes. Papa's small villa was there to receive us, and there we lived like mice, not to be noticed."

Like mice, not to be noticed. Doug began to see it all. A sleeping beauty, and John Fraser hadn't given her enough of a kiss to wake her up. Not really, Doug decided. She was so untouched. He tried not to think of the kiss he would like to administer.

"Ach"—Elna moved under his gaze and gave an apologetic little laugh—"so now you know much of me and I know nothing of you, Herr Konsul. Were you ——"

"Can't we drop the Herr Konsul, since this is an unofficial dinner? The name's Doug Campbell, you know."

"Herr Campbell. Yes, that is nicer." It wasn't what Doug meant, but he let it go for the present. "What of you and the war, first? That is where you have this odd scar, surely." She gestured gently toward his temple.

"That's a French Resistance decoration." He smiled. "I was with the maquis a long time, with OSS and afterward. They were a great bunch and we had some great times. I'll tell you about it sometime. Not tonight. Next time," he said, making it explicit, and hoped the suggestion sank in.

"And before that? In America?"

"Well, I was sort of like you. I knocked all over the world as a kid. My mother died when I was little and my father was an oil engineer. I'd meet him for vacations wherever he was. I liked that. In Texas, Venezuela, Iraq ——"

"Iraq?" Elna sparkled. "But naturally we have been much there also, though perhaps on cross-purposes as you call it. I remember each time we go back to Mesopotamia there are more oil searches there and always we grumble because your oil digs may damage our digs for relics. Especially one year near Nippur, where papa suspects fine Sumerian remains."

"Nippur? My father and I went to some excavations there. One of the company geologists was an archaeology hound and took us down to see them."

"When? When?" cried Elna. "I do not think others ever excavated at Nippur. We were there thirty-five and part of thirty-six."

"Thirty-six, I think," echoed Doug. They looked at each other, amazed by this tie. "Yes, it was the winter of thirty-six I was there. I flew over for the Christmas holidays and stayed until ——"

"No. No," Elna said. "Do not recall exactly and I will not ask, because thus we may pretend it was the same time and we saw each other there."

"Well," said Doug, though he was pretty sure he couldn't have missed Elna any time after she got out of the cradle, "it's a funny idea. I'll buy it. How old were you? Nine? Ten, maybe?"

"Maybe."

"Blond pigtails, I bet you," Doug described enthusiastically, "and a peely sunburned nose from the desert. Mine always did."

"Right. Right," she was laughing, "and Mamachen putting on always the sun cream."

WHAT was it she had? Sweetness, spontaneity, strength that glowed through and lit her beauty from within as the candle and firelight lit it from without. She turned toward him and the combination nearly put his eye out. This was the girl you dreamed of all your life, and once in a million lifetimes you found her.

Dinner was over and the fire burned down to embers, but they sat on quietly smiling at each other across the table, the new-found common interests and experiences glowing and growing between them.

"How much this has made me remember," Elna said at last. "I am so thankful to you for it and for this great feast. But now we must go because what I have not remembered is papa alone and waiting. He will be so interested that you were once at Nippur, and perhaps even remember that visit."

They left, but Doug took the proverbial longest way home and made the most of shell holes and road repairs as he did so.

"It's still a mystery to me," he said, wanting to know more, to know all about her, "how you managed to keep out of all the Hitler Jugends and clubs and things. Your father was old and your mother ill. But you? I know how the Nazis had everybody ticketed and I don't see how you side-stepped, a girl from one of the old great families on one side, and your father an internationally known scholar on the other."

"Yes"—Elna's voice came low and unhappy from the darkness beside him—"it took much scheming at first. But we were far away. We had name, yes, but not wealth and we lived obscurely. Mamma's illness was already appearing and we made it seem she must be always in her wheeling chair so that I might not be spared for this and that outing or club or rally. Also it was natural in our circumstances I should be taught at home by papa. We made other excuses that I must practice with my languages with both mamma and papa, saying it could be of much value to the party later. Later mamma was indeed helpless, but I had learned nursing a little and when it was possible I left her to nurse our neighbors. It was a great need in remote places. And at last even our local Gauleiter accepted I am most needed in Ober, and stopped summoning me." Her voice trailed off and she gave a little laugh. "You make me talk, talk, talk of myself which I never did before. Let me be silent and then I am sure, even with these roads, you may go faster."

"Government officials are requested to set an example about speeding," Doug said primly. "And please don't stop talking. It's like fresh air to hear a genuine anti-Nazi story after months of listening to SS Standarten Führers claim they were in the party only from necessity, and watching leaders of the old Racial Problems bureaus buy off the de-Nazification courts and pop up as heads of schools again. It's enough to make a man sick. . . . Elna, you're crying!" Doug jerked both the car and his tongue to a stop. Her head was bent so low only the velvet bow was visible, her shoulders shaking uncontrollably. He caught her hand. "Elna, forgive me. I don't know what hit me. I get so mad at the whole mess over here—it boils around inside me—and I forgot you're a German, too, and there's a good Germany left still in spite of the same old gang trying to make trouble the same old way. Elna, forget it. I'd no business to ——"

"It is all right," she murmured. "You say only what the world knows of us. And I am German, of this people that have thrown away their arts and skills for hates. And so we are hated. And for this I will be hated as a German when I go in America. Is it not so? Yes, it is so," she sobbed.

"No, it is not so," said Doug. He had turned the car into the overgrown driveway of a bombed-out country house and the scent of flowers drifted around them in the summer night.

"So now I spoil our party with my troubles." Elna wiped her eyes and drew her hand away, touching his sleeve lightly as she did so, begging a return to lightness. "But I will now be good again. It is so long that I do not speak to anyone except what is cheerful that I —— Oh, oh," she sobbed against another flood of tears, "oh, please excuse me for this. I cannot, I cannot stop."

"Cry it out, Elna," said Doug, and with the homely phrase he pulled her into his arms, willing her to feel his tenderness around her. He put his lips against her shining hair as he had longed to do all evening, as he had longed to do since the first moment he had seen it, and let her sob on helplessly against him—the bursting of a dam that, once broached, must drain itself dry. "Everything will be all right, Elna. Don't worry. Everything will be all right, I promise you." He held her gently, but he was kissing her eyes now and could taste her tears. "Elna," he said to her. "Elna." His lips reached hers at last and the earth, the starlit heavens stood still. A moment only, and she pulled away, drew a long shuddering sigh, and hid her face in her hands.

"Ach," she whispered, "this is not excusable. I cannot think what came to me."

"I can," said Doug. "You're tired from years of strain. And you're scared. You aren't sure you want to marry John Fraser after two years. You're wondering what he's like now—if you ever knew."

He could almost feel Elna's cloak of poise slide over her again. "That is quite wrong. In one thing only you are right. I am tired," she said in a small, distant voice and moved to the smallest, most distant edge of the seat. "Let us go home at once, please."

Doug reached to draw her back, but she squeezed farther and smaller away.

"Please, no. I am much ashamed," and that was her response to his every word and gesture the rest of the way home. "Please, please no," until as the car stopped before the pension she had the door open before Doug could turn off the motor.

He lunged desperately after her, however, and, catching her arm, slid under the wheel and out of the car with her. He loosed his grip on her arm, but circled her wrist with a handcuffing thumb and middle finger and walked with her thus up the path. She affected not to notice her pinioned wrist.

"I thank you so much for this gasthaus dinner," she said, once more the elegant Fräulein of the morning. "Good night, Herr Konsul."

"Don't you Herr Konsul me," Doug said crudely and, pulling her to him, he kissed her on the lips. Hard, this time. "I love you Elna. You saw it happen when you walked i this morning. And tonight ——"

"Tonight we will forget," she said, he voice breaking slightly, "if you wish to pleas me."

"No," said Doug. "No. We must —— But she had managed to ring the bell. Bol were drawn inside the door and while he wa still stammering "Tomorrow we must —— it opened and she was gone.

Doug was back on the doorstep at eleve next morning, carrying what he counted o to assure him a warm welcome: the profes sor's provisional papers assembled by mile and hours of long-distance telephoning an chopped-up red tape. Provisional, of course on Charles Halvorson in Chicago being abl to give the State Department a quick enough shove, and Doug had also cable about that.

This was the opening gun in the whirlwind courtship campaign he'd spent the nigh planning between dreams of Elna gay acros the candlelight, and Elna sobbing helpless i his arms, of a small Elna in braids, and a ta Elna slender and composed across the consu lar desk. He'd even had a sensible little pre dawn chat with Student Fraser. Sorry, chum he'd thought-waved to Lake Forest. Yo should have come after her yourself sometim in two years if you wanted to hang on to he Yes, I know how civilian travel was till th summer. Even if you got over you'd have bee months getting back. But you ought to ha risked it. Still, you're young and there'll another girl along for you before you know Your next house party, probably. But for m there's only Elna.

Only Elna. Only Elna. The words echoe around him as he stood there telling himse brightly that everything was going to be right, just as he'd promised Elna last nigh The professor mightn't welcome the chang at first, especially now that his appoin ment in the States meant he'd hardly separated from Elna at all. Still, he was wise old boy; he'd want her happiness first all, and Doug could dwell on the speed of a travel and the fact that his own base wa really in Washington. His transfer was du any time now, and meantime a lot cou happen.

A lot did. Not any of it, however, accor ing to his midnight campaign plan. First all, Elna was out at eleven. Would the He Konsul see the Herr Doktor? No, the He Konsul would return later. At one she w still out, and also at three and so, since could see the maid getting jittery at so muc official attention, he allowed himself to led upstairs and presented the hard-wo papers to the professor with what enth siasm he could muster, trying not to noti Elna's yellow knitting bag by her chair Student Fraser's possessive smirk from t desk.

Doctor Ehrnstrom was ensconced behir the same lap robe and scholarly tome. H greeted Doug courteously and signed on t dotted lines, but yesterday's warmth was absent from the room as Elna's person, a his thanks for such—ahem—extremely exp ditious arrangements carried an unmistak ble note of disapproval. He wished, moreov to take this opportunity of the Herr Konsu kind visit to make himself completely explic about Fräulein Ehrnstrom's future arrang ments. If, in spite of Herr Campbell's—aga ahem—so-optimistic calculations, the pr fessor's own credentials did not appear time from Washington, her original sail date was to stand. This was final. H affianced husband (Doug tried not to win under the glance the professor shot him wi the phrase) would greet Elna on her arriv with his mother as was correct, and the we ding, completely private as was also corre in the case of mourning, would immediat follow their arrival at Lake For-rest. T measured accents outlining this calendar events left no doubt of their meaning: Ke off the Grass. What had he guessed, or El confessed, of last evening?

"But suppose Elna herself wishes —" He caught the frosty gleam of the professo pince-nez and decided that, until he a Elna had reached an understanding, it would be wiser not to antagonize the old gentleman any further. "Very well. I will notify Fräulein Elna" (he'd be darned if he'd back down as far as Fräulein Ehrnstrom) "when your credentials are received and she can then ——"

"That is no longer necessary," corrected the professor. "I am stronger each day and will be able to visit your office myself in the usual way. Until then, Herr Konsul, my compliments."

All right. All right. Keep up the old German game of Herr This and Herr That until they could get down to facts. Doug bowed, practically a heel clicker.

"My compliments, Herr Professor. I will keep you informed."

So it's war, he thought, walking slowly back to his car. Well, it was love too. After years of laughing it off, he'd not only fallen flat on his face but had done it, in the phrase he'd thought was just a joke, at first sight. And it wasn't only on his side, he'd swear to that. Something had flashed between them last night, not the impulse of two lonely people in a lonely moment but something true, deep and strong. Shared laughter, shared tastes as well as shared emotion. Something almost tangible even before he got her in his arms on the way home. Something that had waked him that morning to a wild conviction that she, too, was waking with the sunrise, and waking not to the memory of Student Fraser's two-year-old kisses but his own good-night one. As he was remembering her hidden response to it. It was crazy. It was like something out of a scenario, but it was fact and he was going to fight hell and high water, not to mention that good-looking kid in the silver frame, till he got her.

He turned the key in the ignition, roared his motor ostentatiously, and rolled away from the pension. Once out of sight of its windows, however, he backed the car into a shrub-sheltered driveway at the entrance to the little dead-end street on which the boardinghouse stood, and prepared to wait. He felt pretty sure Elna had been brought up to be home before dark if she was unattended.

He was right. Just before dusk she turned from the boulevard into the obscure side street, slender and composed that if you hadn't held her sobbing in your arms last night you'd have thought her mistress of any situation. Which she was, except this wacky one of being obligated to marry a youngster two worlds and two years away. Of course it was crazy to see how it had happened. Young Winchinvar Fraser at twenty had never seen anything like Elna. And Elna at eighteen had never seen anyone at all. Doug had plenty of time to figure this out before Elna came around the corner.

He stepped out in front of her, cutting off her retreat, and at the sudden sight of him her gray eyes rayed once—he felt the flash through his whole body—and then he saw the little cloak of dignity slide over her skin.

"Good evening, Herr Konsul," she said. "You have been calling with my father?"

"Yes, once. And three calls for you. Elna, we know that we must talk. Will you come ——"

He saw her poise for flight and circled her wrist strongly again with his thumb and middle finger, as when she had tried to escape last night. He imagined he could feel the fine blue veins on the skin of its inner side—really blue blood there, he thought—as she tried to twist it free.

"I must talk to you, Elna. About last night, and other things. Coffee or cocktails, which shall it be? I promise to bring you back ——"

"Nein, danke. Not one or other, please. I am too busy today, Herr Konsul."

"Nothing so important as our business, Elna. And stop calling me Herr Konsul. If you don't want to go anyplace, we'll just drive. I have the car here."

She shot a droll glance toward it, lurking in the leafy tunnel. "So I notice," she said. "But nein, Herr Kon—Herr Campbell. I am already late home."

A couple passed, glancing curiously at them. He couldn't stand there much longer handcuffing her wrist and he couldn't carry her off bodily—which was what he really wanted.

"Then I will call at the pension again this evening."

"Nein, Herr . . . Campbell. This evening I go out."

"Oh, I don't think so," said Doug. "But I'll be there to take you in case you do."

She stamped. "It must be fine to be a victor," she said and tried again to pull her wrist free. This time he let it go.

"Maybe I deserve that," he said.

He had thought she would run when he released her, but at his words she stopped and looked earnestly at him.

"No. No. I do not mean to hurt you with this kind of Occupation words. And if you wish to be friends, with all last night's foolishness forgotten, I will go a small drive with you in the beautiful twilight. Understanding it is for one hour only, and friends' talk only," she ended firmly.

It wasn't quite what Doug had had in mind, but he was glad of any terms. "I promise," he said and was glad he had, because it was, as she foretold, a beautiful twilight hour.

They drove awhile and then stopped at a little park Doug liked which had miraculously escaped the bombings. Doug collected little city parks. They were one of the things he especially liked in European cities, unexpected plots of grass and trees and flowers, always so characteristic of the nation you found them in, centering around a statue or fountain or tablet, with benches where you could sit to admire.

This one was very German, an exact square surrounded by thick square-cut trees and facing a horrendous statue of a spike-helmeted German cavalry officer at full charge.

"It's peaceful here," Doug said as he led her to the leaf-shadowed bench, "in spite of the militant gent. Probably your grandfather," he teased.

"No, but I think it is a great-onkel," she said, covering her face in mock terror and looking through her fingers. And someway he wasn't sure it wasn't true.

Darkness came soon and gently to the little square island as they talked, and the talk was, as he had promised, the talk of friends.

"This is the next time for your war story you did not tell me last night," she suggested, smiling. And he found himself describing those months with the Resistance French, the wild crazy fun they'd had, the wild crazy fighting.

"I remember one night ——" he said each time she prompted him, and the tales kept spilling out, the grim side forgotten and the gay side uppermost.

Soldier's Return

By Eleanor Halbrook Zimmerman

He came too suddenly upon quiet days
After the shattering impact of the dark
Alive with flame, where Death had sought to mark
Him and his comrades in a thousand ways,
And now that safety comes, and battles cease,
It is as though his blood recorded still Uneasy questionings of this bright peace,
With hidden danger on a distant hill.

Sunbeam

RADIANT CONTROL TOASTER

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Automatic Beyond Belief!

NOW! All you do is drop in the bread

Bread lowers itself automatically, no levers to push

Toast raises itself silently, without popping or banging

PERFECT TOAST—EVERY TIME

Makes no difference what kind of bread you use—you get the same uniform toasting every time.

RADIANT CONTROL automatically adjusts itself for every kind of bread . . . moist or dry, thick slices or thin.

This is the entirely new toaster that has completely changed people's conception of what an automatic toaster should do! Only after you've seen it make toast can you appreciate the sheer magic of its carefree operation.

No levers to push—no popping or banging. Just drop in the bread and let the Sunbeam take over. This turns on the current and the bread silently lowers. When perfectly toasted, the current turns off and the toast comes up silently. It's that sensational.

The new Sunbeam even regulates the toasting automatically, depending on the kind of bread. If the slices are moist it toasts them a little longer than if they are dry. If they are thin, it toasts them quicker than thicker slices. Moist or dry, thick or thin—you always get the same uniform golden color you want—automatically. Ask your dealer to demonstrate the new Sunbeam Toaster for you.

Only Sunbeam has patented RADIANT CONTROL. The heat radiated from the actual surface of the bread is focused on a sensitive strip of bimetal. When the bread reaches the scientifically correct temperature for perfect toasting, sufficient heat is absorbed by the thermostat to shut off the toaster. The toasting is always the same no matter what kind of bread you use, regardless of line voltage, once you set ■ for the brownness you want.

"So you liked this kind of fighting?" she said, wiping laughter from her eyes after one near-comic-opera incident.

"Who likes any kind of fighting?" he answered, sobering. "But it was better than most. You were on your own and once in a while you knew you'd done something that was important."

Elna had sobered with him. "But that describes a good way of life," she said, adding after a moment's reflection, "your way of life, I think."

"Maybe. After I get rid of you fräuleins." Doug grinned, and they went on to talk about other good ways of life and what they thought about them. And from philosophy they went on to education, because Doug was concerned about the trend in Germany and the easy way the old Nazi teachers were slipping back into key education posts. "I keep trying to figure out ways for children—at home too—to be taught in little groups, like country schools in the old days. And have more tutors and less big lecture courses in the universities. You don't get mass-produced mistakes that way. Personalized teaching such as your father gave you, Elna."

"Yes," assented Elna slowly, "I was taught much, but it was too personal, too classic, it was not—what is your word?—the balance. I know much of history and reading, for instance, but nothing of modern arts. What I see in photographs I do not understand at all. Do you like them?"

"I know some I think you'd like," he said and they were deep in talk again until suddenly when a match flared in the dusk as Doug lit a cigarette, she jumped like Cinderella at the stroke of twelve.

"But it is late. We fly."

They didn't fly exactly, though, but drove home in contented silence and Doug did not break over until they were back.

"I have been completely correct this time?" he asked at the doorstep. "No complaints?"

"No complaints," she smiled. "All most correct."

"Then, it being a correct courtship, I may call this evening? We haven't much time, Elna. And I'm going to make you marry me, you know."

Gaiety fell away and she faced him desperately. "Oh, please say no more of this. Oh, please do not." There was a rush of tears in her eyes and her voice and Doug had to hang on hard to the memory of last night to force the issue again. If there was a chance, a hundredth chance he was right, if she felt a hundredth of what he did, he had to keep on.

"I must," he said. "We both must. You know there is something between us. Something too big to deny."

"No," she said, but a half-strangled sob escaped with the denial.

"Yes," he answered. "I'll be back tonight." He tried to catch her to him, but she had got a key from her purse and slipped through the door without a backward glance.

At eight-thirty Doug was ringing the doorbell again. My day on a pension porch, he told himself grimly.

"Fräulein Ehrnstrom?" he inquired, not noticing the maid's fright this time because he was more scared than she was. To his relief, however, she responded, "The Fräulein awaits you," and he started toward the stairs to the Ehrnstroms' sitting room, only to be intercepted by a firm "This way, bitte," and be conducted to the overstuffed parlor.

The boarders were all there, sipping their after-dinner ersatz-coffee fluid, and Elna presented Doug carefully to each. There was a discussion of the unseasonable weather, of the Herr Doktor's illness and recovery. He had, it seemed, been well enough to descend for dinner this evening for the first time, but was now retired after such exertion. He would be desolated to forgo the Herr Konsul's call. Was it not fine news he might re join Fräulein Elna so soon after her mar riage? It gave one faith in good miracles again. A large soprano rendered a couple o difficult arias—unsuccessfully from ever angle except volume, although there wa enough of the latter to make the room quive like a bridge subjected to the fatal violi note. More music followed, some worse some better, while Elna sat on avoidin Doug's eye. It was a long sit, but eventuall the boarders began to drift off, and Frau Landlady, after another interval of sup pressed yawns, added her good night, closin the piano and switching off lamps with wha Doug felt were unnecessarily loud snaps.

Elna rose. "I am so sorry you must go Herr Campbell," she said and he found him self in the hall.

"Gute Nacht, Fräulein," he said in Ger man for the benefit of the last broad back disappearing up the stairs. "Permit me t thank you for this so-delightful evening."

Elna's eyes danced a little, but they stil did not meet his and her lips were presse tight together. She opened the big front doo and waited for him to leave. After a correc interval Doug closed it from the inside wit an authoritative bang, and at the sound ar other light switch clicked off from above Like all her profession, Frau Landlady wa an electricity saver, and only a small nigh light now glowed from the landing. Dou couldn't have planne it better himself. H took Elna by the shou ders and shook he gently.

"You witch. Yo wretch and witch," h whispered, and at las they were close again muffling their laughte It lasted only a mo ment, however, an then Elna was at th big knob again, open ing the door silentl and motioning hi through.

Women do about all the reading and playgoing that is done in America; at least they are responsible for most of the playgoing, since men mostly "go along" under their influence. They keep up most of our music, they maintain most of our painting and sculpture, they are the mainstay of our churches, our educational, cultural and social institutions, they are the arbiters of taste and style for both sexes and in all particulars. —HENRY A. BEERS.

"We make jokes," she whispered, "but am quite serious too. Go now, please."

"Not without you," said Doug. "Com outside a minute, Elna."

She shook her head and tried to pull awa Doug nodded with equal vehemence an drew her to the threshold.

"If you don't," he warned, raising h voice slightly, "I'll make a scuffle. I swear will."

He had already made one. There was a inquiring sound from above and Elna, glan ing nervously up toward it, slipped the latc and followed him out. The street was com pletely dark and so was the small hooded porch, fragrant with the white clemati climbing over it. Doug gathered her in hun grily, found her lips and kissed them. Sh resisted a minute and then with a sigh r laxed in his arms.

"That's it, my darling," he murmure against her cheek. "That's what's happene to us."

"No," she pleaded, but without movin "it is wrong."

"It is not wrong," he told her. "Don cry, sweet. It's because it's right that it ha pened so fast. Don't fight it. Don't try t fight it. You're going to marry me, Elna. No body but me. Oh, my darling, I love you. love you so."

She looked up at that, her face white the darkness, looking straight into his ey for one long moment, and in that momen he knew she loved him, as suddenly an completely as it had come to him, and come and pin wheels whirled around him.

"Elna, Elna," he exulted, catching h close again.

It was a short-lived joy. Heavy footste sounded along the pavement and turned t the walk to the pension.

"Let me go. Oh, please let there be n talking of this in the house. Please let m go." Elna struggled frantically.

She was still trembling as they moved to casual good-night position at the door an he held both her hands to steady her until the footsteps came alongside.

"Until tomorrow, then," Doug said, pressing her cold fingers hard as he swung the door open for her.

"Guten Abend, Fräulein," boomed the intruder heartily, bowing Elna politely ahead and looking inquisitively at Doug.

"Guten ——" Elna answered faintly and the dark aperture swallowed both figures, leaving Doug to curse all boardinghouses and this one in particular as he strode off.

His office next morning was boiling, as it was the final date to complete civilian formalities for the final August sailing from Bremerhaven. Elna's would be the one after—only she wasn't going—and her father's tentatively set for the one after that. A valuable delaying tactic, Doug thought cheerfully. Give the old gentleman time to get used to things. Messages and messengers came and went with stuff from the Army, stuff from Military Government, stuff from German officialdom. So much paper, in fact, that even ex-Wac Jones' bright eyes didn't notice that the first note of the morning had gone by special messenger to Fräulein Ehrnstrom. The pension wasn't on the telephone so he couldn't have talked to her even if she'd have come to the phone, which something told him she wouldn't.

He longed for her, if only to hear her voice. The clear fine oval of her face turned up to him on the hooded porch last night, her slender back as it melted into the dark shadows of the hall, haunted him. He'd been years falling in love, but this was a record nose dive. He'd driven around by the boardinghouse on the way to the office that morning, mooning up at the windows like a lovesick high-school Joe, but he had a little sense, just a modicum, left. After four calls yesterday, one before breakfast today would set the place buzzing like bees. Like hornets, rather, when it came to the professor. Until Doug could have a straightforward talk with him this afternoon—and it would probably take more than one persuasive talk—he'd better go slow. He went slow by sending (a) for the parental eye an official summons for Fräulein Elna Ehrnstrom for twelve-thirty that morning at the consulate and (b) a note for Elna herself in a box of yellow roses. He had to content himself with the florist's variety, not the fragrant garden kind she always reminded him of, but the color was right anyway. "I love you," the note said. "If you aren't here on the dot I'll come after you. With the MP's. DOUG."

SHE came. The clock moved to 12, 12:15, 12:20, 12:30, and the last time Doug looked out, she was there. Sitting poised and elegant in her slender black just as she'd looked the first day, and at the sight comets and pin wheels burst around him again. He knew she could feel him at the doorway, too, because she was gazing so fixedly out the window, and he went back to his desk grinning. Well, at least one girl would have sat against that wailing wall who had turned the tables and left a Yank, a Yank lieutenant at that, waiting at the church. Probably the first and last in the zone to turn down honorable matrimony and a passport to the States.

"I'll knock off for lunch now, Jonesy," he said. "I'll be at Hermann's Hof Brau if an international crisis comes up."

"Considering the crowd, you'd better make it snappy with the blue-plate special, then," Jonesy answered, very New Yorkese. "I'll close both doors and call it a conference."

"Good idea," Doug said, hoping she'd leave them shut till he got out of sight with Elna.

"Fräulein Ehrnstrom," he said, approaching her ceremoniously and speaking in German, "I am sorry to summon you again, but there are a few more details in connection with your father's papers. If you will walk with me now I will explain as we go."

She hesitated, and eyes began to turn toward her questioningly as she neither answered nor moved while Doug stood waiting politely in front of her. It was clear he meant to go on waiting and she rose reluctantly.

"It is just a matter of a short delay," he said in his best official manner. And at these all-too-familiar words indifference settled back over the room. He and Elna walked out.

"It was joking," she said accusingly as they turned to the wide staircase, "when you say I must come here."

"Not joking at all. I'd have died if you hadn't," Doug said and looked it. Then, because it swept over him she was really there, he laughed and said so. "You're here," he exulted.

"Because I must. Your letter which summons me so officially came to papa's eyes."

"Dear, dear," clucked Doug, "but you could have pretended to come and gone shopping."

She started forward so suddenly that he had to do some tall striding to catch up with her, which he did, with the now-familiar handcuff grip on her wrist, gentle but unbreakable, keeping it so till he had maneuvered her into his car at the curb.

"Come on, beautiful," he coaxed, eying her set profile. "How about a big smile and a quick lunch? I can't be gone but an hour or so today."

"What I must say will take much less than that," she replied, eyes straight ahead. "And so I will say it now while you, please, take me home."

"Sounds grim. I guess it will go down better with lunch. But can't you just wipe off that Early Christian Martyr expression? Look happy, my darling. We are happy because we've got everything to be happy about. We've found each other, that's wonderful. What's a million times more wonderful, we love each other. The rest is only official stuff to unwind. Nothing else matters."

"There is much else that matters, and I come with you only to explain it. To stop these meetings and pretendings, like a child's game. Our business is concluded——"

"Not," Doug interpolated, "not by a darn sight."

She ignored this. "I come with you only that we may have an understanding together, clear and for all future. You know what it is."

"No idea unless it's to set the wedding date. And the place I've picked for lunch was built for the purpose. A regular Romeo and Juliet balcony."

"You make facetious again." She smiled, but he could feel her put on the dreaded little cloak of worldliness that fitted her so well. "I am foolish, I see, to make great drama of some moonlightness. I forget you also make Yank fun under your ——"

"Under my gray hair?" Doug interrupted shortly, touching the streak that ran back from his temple. Something in the air scared him.

"No, no"—her voice warmed—"I mean only that you, too, are young and perhaps lonely under your more responsible work. So I, too, will make young and facetious so we may be friends and enjoy this lunch together in farewell. I have not been this place before. It is charming."

For they had reached the gray old building with its promised balcony overhanging the river, a bit of medieval beauty that had escaped the bombing.

A waiter bowed, "Herr Konsul," with genuine pleasure and led them to a far table, seating Elna so that she was silhouetted against blooming flower boxes along the old carved balustrade. How she fitted the mellow setting, fitted any setting, Doug thought, with her slender elegance. Already other eyes had found her, openly admiring her fine-boned beauty, her smooth gold hair.

"Elna"—emotion burst through him—"you are so beautiful, so wonderful. Look at me, Elna."

She did not turn her gaze from the river flowing below them, but a flush rose slowly from her neck, to her cheeks, to her forehead and he could have sworn her heart was pounding in unison with his own, and that the magic current was flowing again between them.

"Now we are back with what spoils good companionness," she said, very low. "You know I am affianced, and will remain so. It is a mistake that I did not go home at once. I hoped we might part with smiling. But now, please to excuse me, let me leave."

She tried to rise, pushing back the table that hemmed her against the balustrade, while Doug, cursing himself, held it firmly in place. Why couldn't he go slower, not rush her so? But he had the feeling he must push her, pin her in every corner, take advantage of every chink in her armor lest she rush headlong in the opposite direction, running to heartbreak for them both, mistaking it for the path of duty. Take it easy. Very easy, he advised himself.

"Sorry," he said, taking the advice but keeping the table firmly against her, "but you forget this is a business lunch too. About a passport. If you'll sit down again, we'll settle that."

"I do not think so," she said. "Those affairs will settle themselves in your office. Now I will go, please."

"Please sit down again, Elna, I'll be good," he pleaded, hurling his whole will power across to her. She sank back weakly and her voice was faint.

"I have your promise, Herr Konsul?" she asked.

"The name is Campbell, remember? Doug to my friends, and we're friends again now, aren't we? Try it."

"Herr Doug," she obeyed.

"That's better. Now, forget the Herr. Just Doug."

"Doug," she repeated, and her voice chimed, the way it could, so that it took all his resolution not to snatch her hand lying so temptingly near on the table. Something warned her, though, because she moved it to her lap with the other. "Doug Campbell. That is a very Yank name," she said, managing a little smile.

"It is a completely un-Yank name," Doug contradicted. "Because the works is Douglas Douglas Campbell. A touch redundant, perhaps, but you get used to it. You will anyway, because it's going to be on your calling cards."

It was the waiter arriving with the menu who forestalled her flight this time, a motion Doug pretended not to notice.

"I feel like celebrating," he said. "I hope you do."

She did not answer but continued to look at him, soberly waiting.

If Winter Comes, Can Spring be Far Behind?

By James Menzies Black

Oh, happily, happily, I'd embark
To a spa in Fla. or a park in Ark.,
To a beach in Cal. or a coast in Tex.,
Or possibly even a tour of Mex.

It isn't so far to Miss. or La.,
And twinkles the sun in Southern Ga.
Where the flowers bloom and the climes invite
The seasons seasoned with Fahrenheit.

Hoorah for all! Each is a state
In deference here I abbreviate.
No niggard I, and I'm not a stinter;
It seems to fit their contracted winter.

They welcome spring with an early shout
And carefully, carefully spell it out.
Oh, yes, I envy their distant glow
And wait, impatient, in Northern O.

IF YOUR "COWBOY" HAS TROUBLE KEEPING UP WITH THE OTHERS
PERHAPS ALL HE NEEDS IS A SIMPLE HELP LIKE THIS

If your young "buckaroo" slows up before his pals, it may be due to faulty nutrition.

Many children who are thought to be "well-fed" may in fact be "subclinically undernourished"—not really sick but not quite well. They may get lots of food but not always enough of the right kind. Such children obviously need special care in the selection of the foods they eat.

A mother should remember that a child needs, proportionately, 2 to 3 times as much of certain food elements as an adult. These food elements include protein, calcium, iron, vitamins B_1, C, niacin and riboflavin. These may be called the "spark plugs" of robust health. A child needs lots of them. A lack of one or more can cause a slump. And—please note this—they are the very ones in which meals are most apt to be deficient.

In theory—one can provide an adequate family diet by serving a wide variety of carefully selected foods and thereby obtain all the essential elements. And this every mother should strive to do.

In practice, however—this often is hard to do, because of the many problems of food buying, seasonal shortages, storing and cooking, and the wide differences in individual tastes and requirements within the family. And so, today—busy, intelligent mothers employ a sound and simple method in approaching this problem. They use a supplementary food like Ovaltine.

Ovaltine is a rich supplementary food that fills in the gaps, the chinks, and the loopholes that may occur in otherwise "good" meals. Ovaltine, mixed with milk, contains practically all the vitamins and minerals necessary to bring such meals up to the full requirements of a growing child. It also provides an extra supplement of high quality proteins.

So why don't you join the host of other mothers in this health promoting program through better nutrition. Give 2 to 3 glasses of Ovaltine daily in addition to regular meals. Then you can be sure you have taken a logical step toward insuring proper nutrition for your child.

NOTE: Ovaltine has a remarkable appeal to children as a hot drink at breakfast. So start the day right with a bracing hot drink every morning.

He said, "Elna, I understand and respect all you have been trying to say. Now listen to my side without interrupting and in the broad light of day. I love you. I loved you the minute you walked into my office, and I think it was as sudden and complete for you as for me. And this I swear to you, Elna. I have never asked a girl to marry me before. I ask you now with all my heart's devotion. Will you be my wife, Elna?"

A LIGHT ran across her face and she was very still a moment. "I thank you," she breathed, "for this great compliment, and I believe your words." She drew another breath. "It is, as you know, impossible."

"It is not impossible," said Doug. "And only one thing on earth could make it so: that you don't love me. Say that. Say you don't love me, that last night and the night before were moon-madness, and I'll bow out. But I think, I dare to think that it was your affair with young John Fraser that was an emotion of the moment, war emotion at that, and it's our love that's the deep thing, the mature thing, the thing that will last. Give me a chance, Elna, just a chance to show what my love, what our love could really be. You owe us both that. Already we have something that you and he never had, haven't we? Haven't we, Elna?"

She tried to shake her head, but he held her eyes and slowly her lashes, those lashes so dark against her blondness, dropped and covered them. The waiter, scenting crisis, busied himself elsewhere.

The girl drew another deep breath. "I cannot marry you," she said painfully.

"Because of John?"

"Because of Jo-hn," she replied. Her accent softened the name to two syllables, Jo-hann, and a jealous rage swept Doug.

"I'm not giving up," he said harshly. "And you haven't answered the real question either. Put it this way. If you had never seen John Fraser, would you marry me? Or, at least, let me try to make you? That's the only way to decide this."

"Nein," she said, and already he had discovered it was bad news when she lapsed into German. "No. So I have answered your question once and for all times. I go to marry, as I have long promised, a true and good young man who has long waited."

"The world is full of good young men," he said angrily.

"That," said Elna, gazing over his shoulder at the ruined bridges and gaping towers of the city, "is unfortunately not true. Let us not argue more. I am decided."

There was no doubt of it. She was suddenly in command of herself and the situation.

She pushed back the table gently and stood up. "So now let us not meet again for further distress. Let us part now, brief friends. We thank you, my father and I, for your kind interest and wish you all good fortune."

"Elna, you can't! You—I—we ——" Anguish made him incoherent as he stumbled to his feet beside her.

The waiter appeared apologetically. "Pardon to disturb, Herr Konsul," he said. "It is a military police come with this hand note." He caught Doug's glare and shrank. "Pardon," he repeated.

Doug took the envelope, maneuvering himself between Elna and the other diners to cut off her retreat. He'd got his second wind.

"Don't you move an inch without me," he said firmly. "We're going to talk some more about duty and honor and stuff and then we're going to your father and tell him ——" The waiter hovered anxiously again with the envelope. "Excuse me a minute while I look at this. Oh-oh," he said, for Jonesy's neat typing read:

"I bet you're with that blonde. Nice, except you forgot a general. He's blowing up. Better hurry."

Elna took advantage of the diversion to get away and only the close-set tables kept it from becoming an out-and-out chase. He caught up with her under the appreciative eye of the military messenger waiting at the curb.

"Take you back, sir?" the noncom offered, adding hopefully, "Drop the lady, too, if she don't mind a Jeep."

"Just present my compliments to the general," Doug said coldly, deciding that the peacetime Army, like Jonesy, had got out of hand. "I've got a car here." He piloted a silent and pinioned Elna to it.

She remained quiet, except to murmur an occasional low "Nein" to everything Doug suggested during the short detour to the pension, so he gave up. Temporarily.

"I'll be back at four," he said as they turned into the familiar little street. "Sooner, I hope."

"Nein," she said for the last time and was out of the car, but not before her composure cracked a little, a wide enough crack anyway for tears to come through.

There seemed only one reason for tears, and he took hope again. "At four. Ja?" he called after her flying figure. Useless to pursue it again, but he could try to cheer it. "Ja," he shouted, "and a couple of jawohls."

He held a smile on the off chance she'd look back, but she didn't and it died a fast death as she disappeared once more through the hated door. He was swearing to himself that this was the end of tears and flights. What had flamed between them, unasked and unexpected, was too good for hole-and-corner meetings. She deserved the soft music and white orchids he'd have liked to give her. In imagination, driving through those bombed-out blocks, he took her to a few courtship spots he would have chosen: a Broadway first night, a game at the Yale Bowl, a cruise on Nantucket Sound. Too bad it couldn't have been like that, seeing the way she'd fizzed like a Fourth of July sparkler just to be invited to a country inn for supper. But he was going to have to do it the hard way: a fight with everything stacked against him, from a disapproving father to a rich-and-handsome rival and the wedding date set. Definitely the hard way. Trust him.

One thing I've got, though, Doug vowed, yanking on the brake in front of the consulate and eying the starred car there with distaste. I love her a way that kid doesn't dream of, or he'd have got here somehow in spite of regulations by this time. The first thing is to win over the professor, make him realize she isn't sure. Which she isn't. I've got that far anyhow.

There was a general waiting, although not the volcanic one from Military Government that Doug expected—that had been one of Jonesy's little jokes—but a special quiet one he'd done some tricky intelligence work for during the war who had just dropped in to talk over old times and also to get Doug's slant on the new times which neither of them liked. On both subjects the general took his time and Doug, perforce, took it with him. After that there were some details to wind up in the office and, what with one thing and another, it was after five when he again presented his card at the pension.

"Herr Professor Ehrnstrom?" he inquired in his best Continental manner, and was shown immediately to the little upstairs sitting room. It was Kaffeeklatsch time again, but there was no fragrance of coffee, either ersatz or food-package, and the professor was no longer a frail old scholar under a lap robe, but very much the worldly European father.

"My daughter is gone from the city, Herr Konsul," he said icily as Doug's gaze went searching past him around the room. "She left her apologies and farewell, but you can understand there is great change in our arrangements now that it appears I am so soon to follow her and both of us, perhaps, remain forever in America. I would have called at the consulate tomorrow, but since you are here you can perhaps give me the necessary information as to restrictions of weight and value in my daughter's luggage. Certain valuable objects and jewels she was leaving here concealed for me in case of need may now go with her, as I wished from the first, as her rightful dowry from her mother."

Carefully Doug answered the professor's consular questions while his mind was shouting an extremely unconsular one of its own: Whose brush-off is this, yours or hers? Whose, I say? and as soon as the official business was concluded he asked it aloud, coming directly to the point:

"Herr Doktor, I see you have discerned what I came here this afternoon to tell you: that I have fallen in love with Elna and I dare to think ——"

THE thin old face darkened with anger. "And I think, Herr Konsul, that you have taken advantage of your office. It was as an official that you met my daughter, a bride going to her husband of the American Army, and it was a matter of duty—I say nothing of honor—that you speed her on her way."

"On the contrary, her official business with me was the possibility of postponing her passage. She has not seen this John Fraser for two years and ——"

"Through no fault of his," interrupted the professor. "Ach, never will I forgive myself this selfishness. When John left, my daughter was to follow as soon as official regulations permitted. You remember the impossibility at that time, both of permission to marry a German and of securing passage to America. By the time that was arranged we knew her mother to be dying. It seemed she should wait that brief time longer, and John most honorably agreed. But it was wrong. The time was not brief and the more her mother's illness was protracted the more impossible it seemed that Elna should leave. Do you think this moment's emotion, an emotion born of delays and waiting, should destroy her well-deserved happiness? I do not permit it, Herr Campbell." The older man was deeply moved.

Doug said carefully, falling into the professor's elaborately rounded German periods, "I share your feeling, sir, that this is untimely. I wish more than you possibly can that I had met Elna before John Fraser did, and could have been less . . . precipitate. I, too, might have shrugged off a love-at-first-sight story, except it happened to me. I loved your daughter the first moment I saw her, two days ago. It would have been the same two years ago. I'm over thirty, not one of these Occupation youngsters, and I come to you as a man of the world with word of myself, my family and my prospects, and in the belief that you wish to be sure of Elna's heart before she goes half across the world to marry a boy she knew only a few romantic weeks. A boy who may now be quite different from her memory of him."

"You plead well," the professor said without any change of expression, "but uselessly. Though an elderly antiquarian, I see what is before me in the modern world. Your methods with my daughter have been, I imagine, tempestuous." He sounds like Shakespeare, Doug thought irritably. "My daughter is swayed by long-pent emotion and sudden shyness of meeting John. But her course is clear and long decided. It is my purpose to protect her from further—ahem—mistaken confusion."

> When there is mud at the bottom of the well, stirring it will not make the water clear. —CHINESE PROVERB.

Doug took another breath and again drew hard on his diplomatic patience and phraseology. "I desire your respect, Herr Doktor, and your affection as well if I can persuade Elna to marry me. Which I tell you frankly I shall use every means in my power to do."

"You will have some difficulty," said the professor dryly, "since she visits elsewhere until her sailing."

Fool, fool that he'd been to let her out of sight. He glanced around the room again and saw signs of that hasty packing and departure—while he was gassing with a general and stamping passports.

"I gather you do not plan to tell me where she has gone," he said with what control he could muster, "that this word is final."

The Herr Doktor did not waste any more words, but bent in a dismissing German bow and waited for Doug to leave. Which Doug did.

After the first shock was over, however, and as he was zooming back to the consulate to set the telephones dancing, he decided it might be a good sign instead of bad that she'd run away. A girl like Elna knew easier ways to brush off an unwanted suitor. It meant she didn't trust herself to see him again and her father had done the rest, wrapping it up in Old World duty and honor. By parental and Old World standards, of course, she was making an excellent match. Money and position—and something told Doug the Frasers had plenty of both—and the security of the United States. He could even hear the modulated old voice advising, "End this madness at once, my Elna. End it for the peace of all."

THERE was another straw or two of comfort. First, she couldn't get far in occupied territory without leaving a trail a mile wide; and second, she would surely go to Oberammergau before she left, as that was the likely place for the valuables the professor had mentioned. And it was a logical guess she'd go there first, attend to her business, and get away before Doug could catch up with her.

He had luck. She'd got a civilian pass for Ober that afternoon, and a trunk call to a friend of Doug's who was instructing in the Army Intelligence School there found that officer tired of theoretical sleuthing and glad to track down an actual girl instead, offering also to keep an unofficial watch at the railroad station and report her arrival immediately. Doug, who had definitely strained ethics in his statement of the case, grinned wryly as he hung up. So much for his noble decision that the rest of the affair should be open and aboveboard. Instead the chase was still on and Elna still dodging.

Little silly, he thought fondly, to go jolting off alone in a third-class carriage when we could have had a swell ride together up the mountains. I wonder if she skis. He could hardly wait to ask her—that and a lot of other things. In fact, if he weren't so jammed up with Saturday's big sailing he'd start this minute on the off chance she'd gone directly there, catch her by surprise and hammer home his advantage. One sign of weakening, one moment of hesitation—one kiss, to be exact—and he'd have her on a plane to Lake Forest with him. They'd face it out with Student Fraser, and if it was Fraser influence that had wangled the professor's job, Doug would find him another if he had to endow a chair. He'd call Washington and ——

BUT Washington called him first. In fact, Jonesy was taking the call as he came in and it wasn't routine but person-to-person, the other person being the big boss himself, as chipper and full of good news as a maternity nurse announcing it's a boy.

"Hey, Douggie," he said, having been an old family friend and dandled Doug upon his knee to that name, "got your transfer set up at last. Just the kind of deal you wanted and just the spot we need you. A couple of weeks' briefing back here and off you go." He went into the details, concluding briskly, "I've got hold of Tom Baker—he knows the Occupation game—and he'll be there Saturday morning to take over for you. That gives you a day to show him the ropes and you can get away Sunday. Just what the doctor ordered, eh, Douggie? Eh? You there, Doug? Hang that operator."

Doug had stopped spinning through space and come back to earth. "Fine," he said in a hollow voice, "that's great. But it's pretty sudden for me. I'm right in the middle of ——"

"Don't worry about anything there. Baker's a good man. He'll take hold easy. I'll see you Monday morning, then."

"But there's an important—this is something I can't leave until ——" Doug stalled.

There was a pregnant pause and the voice from Washington was discreetly lowered. "On to something big, eh? I had a hunch you might turn up something there. Are you fixed at that end so you can talk? Maybe I better call you back on the hush-wire."

Doug counted ten. "Nothing like that, sir. It's personal. I ——"

"Personal!" exploded the telephone. "That means some woman. I thought you had more sense. Well, this transfer is personal too. What you've been yelping for for months, and plenty others ready to jump at it if you don't. You be here Monday. Or else."

"Yes, sir," said Doug, and the chief calmed down enough to go into some details.

What he'd been yelping for was right. An assignment exactly up his alley, and even better than he'd dared hope. And how Elna would grace it. That, not the rich young Gold Coast set, was the life she was cut out for, and it was something he could give her, along with his whole heart and soul. Only first he had to find her. Two weeks to break down her defenses and her father's opposition had looked tough enough—but four days! And his girl, who wasn't even his girl yet, miles away even if he found her before Saturday. He was still staring at the calendar when the phone rang again. Good news this time. An MP at the station reported seeing her board the afternoon train to the mountains. Blonde, black dress. He'd noticed her particularly. I'll bet he did, probably whistled at her, Doug thought, jealously, buzzing for Jonesy, who came in so fast he knew she smelled romance.

"Look, Jonesy," he said, and outlined the high spots for her. Most of which she seemed to know already. "So do you think you can hold the fort here until, say, tomorrow afternoon?" he asked, making it as matter-of-fact as possible. "I'm sorry to unload a big day on you and I'll phone in first thing in the morning. If you get stuck, call Military Government and they'll send Cramer over. Think you can manage?"

Jonesy, quivering with conspiratorial enthusiasm, indicated she would like nothing better and Doug rocketed out of the city and by nightfall he was high in the mountains where a big lover's moon floodlit his way so successfully that he arrived at the little Alpine fastness in tearing spirits and Einstein time. His confederate was waiting at headquarters with directions to the Ehrnstroms' châlet and the names of some acquaintances and former servants where the girl might be found if she wasn't staying in the house. He was also full of more personal offers.

"Want me to come with you?" urged the Intelligence captain, frankly bug-eyed. "What's up? She's the smoothest article in the zone. I never believed in Mata Hari before. Oh, boy."

Doug restrained an impulse to boot his friend and forced a smile. "It's strictly a one-man job and every minute counts," he said, hoping he looked cold and ruthless. "I'm after vital information, but not exactly what you think. Thanks for everything. I'll tell you the story later." He only hoped there was a good day coming when he could do just that by his own fireside with Elna beside him to join the laugh.

Again luck was with him, for there was a light in the châlet when he wound his way up to it, a little gabled and turreted Hänsel-and-Gretel house just right for Elna in this storybook village, and he knew she was there because his heart did the flip-flap that always meant she was near. From sheer relief he blew his horn in a raucous Yank way and then, seeing the light go out uncertainly, regretted the impulse and ran up the steep steps to the eagle's-nest entrance and tapped on the little oval window beside the door, calling her name to reassure her.

"Elna. Elna. It's Doug."

There was silence, but he could feel her standing not far away hesitating and thinking . . . what? His heart did another back flip and he banged again, harder this time on the deep-carved door.

"Elna, I've got to see you. I know you're there, and you know what I'll do if you don't come. Elna, please open the door."

She opened it. "Doug," she said, "you haf come," and she melted into his arms. For once there was no waiter, no landlady, no Jonesy, no Papachen. Just the two of them and the August moon over the mountains. It lasted quite a long time.

"Say you love me," Doug whispered finally against her neck. "Say it. We've got a lot else to talk about, but just say that first."

She put her hands against his chest and pushed him back a little, looking up from shadowed eyes. "Yes," she said, and again there was that sound of bells, "I will say it for the first time and the last time. I love you. . . . No, wait. Wait, Doug. And then we will go into this old Haus and sit down to speak sensibly."

What she said there was a bolt from the blue. Doug had imagined her, in that delirious surrender, following his plan, hurtling back tonight with him over the luminous mountains, breaking the news to her father, a telephone call to John Fraser (Doug had practiced variations of that transoceanic conversation on the drive up) and be ready to marry him when he got back from his briefing in the States, three weeks at the longest, and then they'd take off together for the new job. He'd have wangled all the official changes by that time. Then a wedding, maybe at the tiny church below them which Doug had admired on previous visits, and after that life, love, joy to the full. He poured these hopes out to her, but except for a flash of happiness at the news of his advancement, Elna was back, solemn and immovable in a chair, fending him off.

"So Sunday you go to America. That is best, to stop at once this foolish temptation. To start for you a new life so much to your liking, so much deserved. To start for me also a new life which I will do alles I can to make fine and good."

"You can't, Elna, you can't," Doug cried, but her proud chin, her intelligent eyes told him she could. She could, and she would, make Student Fraser happy with only half a heart, because he would never miss the other half. Only the beautiful shell of Elna would be enough for him. Doug could see the shell getting smoother, cooler, more polished with years until the fires beneath died from sheer lack of recognition and breathing. "You can't," he cried again in anguish, trying to express all this to her. "This—this boy ——"

"Do not speak of John in that way," Elna interrupted with terrifying distinctness. "He was young, yes, but he played a man's part in the war and most honorably since by this waiting. In honor I will go to keep my long promise. I hope not to disappoint him."

Doug groaned, "Elna."

"So, please do not stay more. It is too wrong, too wretched. And if you stay all night, all the remaining days and nights, and ruin your prospects, I still will not change. I will not. Do not think I have not thought carefully since this—this came to us. I have thought deeply, and it is my heart, not my father as you believe"—she looked at him where he knelt, for in his pleading he had come beside her—"that tells me what is right."

"It is not right."

"What is right each must know for himself, Doug. And without right cannot be happiness. For me. And, I believe, for you."

"Don't ring the Wagnerian tragedy into this," he countered angrily, because he was frightened. "I've picked up the pieces of too many love affairs to believe ——"

Elna shrank. "It was not like these others you speak of," she said. "It was correctly met and correctly agreed also by our parents."

"Not so correctly you can't step out of it if you've outgrown each other. He was so young, Elna," Doug burst out. "You don't realize how young a rich kid can be in the States. And he's gone back to college, practically starting it over again, and at home college is the youngest kind of life there is. Look at the snapshots he's sent lately. I saw some of them and he looks like the kid brother of the lieutenant you knew." The gray eyes flickered, so he saw she'd noticed that herself. He drove the advantage home. "It'll hurt, of course, when you tell him about us, but he'll get over it. I promise you in three months, six at most, he'll marry any one of a dozen nice girls on the North Shore. But for me there's only you, Elna. He'll get over it, but I've been waiting all my life for you," he pleaded, saying aloud to her at long last the words he had so often said to himself.

She gave them the moment's silence they merited with her hand to her eyes, so he hoped surrender would come with her tears, but when she spoke it was steadily and in her gentle voice he heard the knell of his hopes.

"No, lieber Freund, it is the other way about. It is John who has waited for me and it is you who will, as you say, get over it."

"How about you, then?" cried Doug desperately. "Will you get over it? Get over it and marry somebody else—practically tomorrow? You can't do it, Elna."

"Yes, I can do it. And you, too, must go to new work as in a war. For indeed my promise to John was of the war and I will not be the German to fail it."

"Elna, this is mad self-sacrifice. Until you said you loved me I was only hoping, but now I know, I swear I will make you happy, make you love as you were meant to love, be alive as you were meant to be alive. We can ——"

Her lips jerked with effort, but her voice as she interrupted carried the same steady conviction. "Please, no more. I have as I told you thought deep of this and my answer is from deep. Our meeting was so late, so short. Think of it, as the old songs say, as a short sweet dream. As I will do. So go now. I ask it. I wish you—I wish you always happy."

Her face was so earnest and beautiful in the lamplight Doug lost himself in gazing, letting each fine-modeled feature sink through his sight down into his heart to keep there forever. Thus her farewell, her sudden move to the door caught him unaware. But she had swung it open, the cold mountain air rushed in to part them and somehow—he never knew how she maneuvered it—he was outside. He heard the latch click and self-lock before he registered its finality, and at the sound he was beating and calling through the heavy panels.

The light, he registered also, had gone from behind the leaded panes of the oval window as if when she closed the door she had dropped a final curtain on their brief interlude, and at the thought he pounded harder until a casement in a little halfway-up tower opened above him.

"Please, Doug, do not bang and call like a child. I will not open again, you must believe so. Nor do not any more wait for me at corners to make more talking, for I will not do that either. And one other thing I remember to say. You must not when you go in America run to John, for if you do so, if you break my vows to him do not think I will then marry you. I will not. This I mean. Please to go now, Doug." Her voice drifted down through the moonlight and her face shimmered in the frame of the open casement. "Let there be an end with dignity," she said quietly and the window smoothly closed.

For a long while he waited, numb and unbelieving, for some further word or sign, his forehead pressed against the ornate door carving until finally, shaking with cold and emotion, he crawled back to his car and rolled slowly back toward the town. As its lights came in sight, realization struck him afresh and with an angry "She can't" he swung the car around again and roared back up the winding road, once more blowing his horn as he approached the villa to tell her he was back, but the tiny-paned windows remained dark and blank, mocking the moonlight that flooded the peaked and pointed roof. He climbed the steep path again to the overhanging portico and gave a few last despairing knocks, echoing the thud of his own heart, but there was no answer. Actually he had expected none. If she had wavered toward his knock, alone there in the dark house, there was no sign.

Doug made one last effort with Doctor Ehrnstrom, whom he found directing the packing of his books and artifacts, a pretty sure indication that Elna would not be back to do it for him.

"Ah," he said, unbending a little at Doug's preamble. "Please to sit here."

He waved off the student helper and retreated to his chair and knee robe. His eyes glowed as Doug told his story.

"Yes, Elna is a child of race. I was sure that by reflection she would see clear and right and I will most surely not, as you urge, try to change her decision. On the contrary, I continue to believe Elna's feeling for you is a reaction from the long delay of her marriage, if, indeed, it is more than kindness to your own—ahem—urgency." He's got the professorial sarcastic "ahem" down pat, Doug thought. "So I will not pretend I am not glad she has sent you from her and glad that your departure makes impossible more such disturbing meetings. I wish you, Herr Konsul, a good future and will intrude no more on your so-crowded time," and Doug found himself once more outside an Ehrnstrom door. At least it was the last time. He was through.

He went through the motions of winding up his affairs, wondering why people called it heartsick when with him the misery was so much deeper-seated. There seemed to be a load of buckshot in his lower abdomen and he had to take frequent deep breaths to keep it there.

You've lost her, his brain would jeer and the weight would lurch up against his diaphragm and nearly throw him.

All through the inevitable farewell parties, all the while he was greeting Tom Baker at the airport and briefing him on the local setup (luckily Jonesy took to weeping so there were no cracks about his blonde) the buckshot continued to hit him like a mid-ocean wave, and when, in the middle of a final unwanted jamboree, the belief swept over him with sudden clairvoyant certainty that somewhere Elna was suffering similar torment, his misery was complete.

"You act as if you'd been passed over instead of getting a big boost," Tom Baker said. "If you weren't the old woman hater in person, I'd say it was a girl. What's her number?"

Doug tried for a gay-dog smirk. "You'll do all right on your own," he said.

And at last he was gone, but not without one last try at the pension the day he left. No, the Herr Professor and the Fräulein were both gone, the apartment already occupied by others. No, they left no address-forward except the ship. So Doug ordered another flock of yellow roses to be delivered there, knowing they'd probably go out the porthole as outward symbols of temptation, and Pretty Boy's photograph take their place.

EVEN the last hours, while he emptied his personal file and filled his battered old service bags, Elna's face flashed in and out of his mind like a neon sign, and as he climbed aboard the Army bomber and took off, as he saw Germany slipping away beneath him and knew he was leaving her there, he groaned and must have groaned aloud, because an Air Force major turned and stared with disapproval.

In Washington he plunged at once into preparation for the new job, trying to get it between him and the remembered words "Go now to your new duty," those gentle Old World words that matched her Old World beauty. It worked pretty well daytimes because the assignment was even more absorbing than he'd expected, but at night he could not escape.

"Yes, I can marry him," she would say through the dark hours. "I keep my words." Or, breaking his heart again each time, "I love you, I will say it once and for all time and then never again."

He was haunted, too, by the feeling that if he'd stayed he might somehow have won out. He'd found her and he'd let her get away. He wrote her by air mail and by diplomatic pouch, and at last he threw discretion to the winds and telephoned transatlantic instructions to Baker and Jonesy that if Elna or her father put a foot in the consulate they were to be kept there—by force if necessary—until he'd made one more appeal. After that he left a trail of telephone numbers behind him every time he stirred. "I'll be at the Pentagon till noon. You can reach me there at extension so-and-so. Then for lunch I'll be at ——" he'd say, trying to ignore the switchboard operator's raised eyebrows. "Who does he think he is?" he overheard her ask. "If he doesn't look out, he'll drop the State Department." Nothing came of it, though. The two Ehrnstroms had gone underground till they sailed, disappeared beyond tracing except by civilian or military police, for which there was no excuse and for which Elna—not to mention the Herr Doktor—would not find forgiveness.

He stood it awhile longer, till the Labor Day holiday loomed up. Time enough at least to go to Chicago and get a line on young Fraser. He'd go to Halvorson first. Doug had made it his business to find out that he'd taught at summer school and was still in town. Up to now every time he'd looked at a Western air-line schedule Elna's grave voice had intervened: "For if you run to John, do not think I will then marry you. I will not. This I mean." But going to Chicago wasn't tackling John Alling Fraser in person. It was just nosing out his reputation, what kind of guy he really was. Two elderly archaeologists could be wrong about a plausible suitor. Or, as he'd so often tried to tell Elna, John Fraser could have changed a lot in two postwar years. Yes, he'd go to Doctor Halvorson first, make an appointment on some pretext about the professor's papers—which was easy, since Halvorson was his sponsor—and be guided by what he learned there. Doug went to the chief about it before he could change his mind again.

"How about my stretching the three-day holiday to a week?" he said. "I'm well ahead on the job and I feel seedy."

"You look it," the older man said bluntly. He had too much on his mind to remember Doug's brief telephonic rebellion, but he kept an affectionate eye on all his hopefuls. "Run along, and have some fun. Washington's tough in summer. Where you going?"

"I thought I'd stop in Chicago first," Doug said. "By the way, d'you know anybody in Lake Forest?"

"Practically everybody. Why?" the big boss said cheerfully. He could answer this about almost any place, any time, and he had them all ticketed, as he went on to prove. "Say, your old OSS side-kick, Speed Merriweather, is living there now. You know that?"

"Speed!" echoed Doug, startled out of his own problems. "I thought he was in South America on your ——"

"Nope. No more. A Lake Forest girl caught him on his last leave and she's going to settle him down there in her father's business—she thinks." He winked elaborately at Doug, as one old bachelor to another. "You try to stir him up again if you go out. We need him."

Doug needed him too. Half of Speed was a crazy daredevil, but the other half was pure socialite. He'd know everybody on the North Shore by now, Doug calculated, and set the long-suffering switchboard operator to work. She tracked down a welcoming roar that nearly blew Doug off the receiver.

"Hey! Say! You!" yelled Speed. "Come on out and meet the bride. . . . Sure she wants you. She's heard enough about you, you old ——" There was an interpolation at the other end of the wire and it brought Speed back with something even better than Doug had hoped for. "Millie says be sure to bring your glad rags. There's a Labor Day dance at the club. Everybody'll be there. Can you make it?"

DOUG could and did, arriving in time for the lovebirds to show him over the love nest before dark—a domesticated Speed showing off his garden was a sight that would have rocked Doug if he hadn't been in such a hurry to get his pal on to other subjects—but at last they settled down, Speed starting up the "do-you-remembers" and Mrs. Speed countering at every pause with an item of local news calculated to guide the conversation back into peacetime channels. She was a nice girl playing a losing game, and Doug had his own reasons for helping her. So after there had been enough interchange of correct names—"Do you know Tom Smith in Washington? Dick Smith in London? Harry Smith in the Diplomatic?"—Doug slipped in the one he'd come for. If it worked, Elna couldn't say it was anything but fate. Just another proof that "it's a small world."

"Happen to know a young John Fraser here, Millie?" he asked, squinting through the trees to Lake Michigan, beginning to turn purple in the twilight.

"Johnny? Who doesn't? It's the big excitement, his German girl coming at last. You think it will work?"

The words were pleasant enough, but there was a condescension in the tone that irritated him. It was what he'd come to hear, though, so he assumed an air of interested inquiry and Millie, glad of any subject lively enough to keep Speed off his war memories until it was time to dress for the inevitable dinner party, whipped into it.

"His mother's still boasting about that title. Is it really a princess? Did you ever see her in Germany? Is she pretty? She'd better be. It's going to kill the whole Junior League Provisional when Johnny steps to the altar. He's a beautiful eyeful. You might see him tonight."

Doug did, and at sight of the young Apollo in the white dinner coat, even handsomer in the flesh than in the silver frame, the features perfect, unscarred, young—ye gods, how young—he felt the dark lines etch deeper around his eyes and the streak of gray widen above his temple. The wildcat of jealousy went into action in his stomach, too, so that he hardly heard Millie's chatter.

"That's Susie Gwynn with him. They won the big tennis doubles last week. Tough luck for her his bonnie lies over the ocean."

His duty dance with his hostess done, Doug wandered miserably off. If there'd been anything on young Fraser, even the smallest juicy morsel, Speed's wife would have known all, heard all and told all. No, Johnny was a popular hero, his romance a local saga, and his forthcoming marriage an accepted fact. Elna would play her part—how beautifully. Good-by, my love, Doug thought. And couldn't bear it.

He wasn't surprised when he found young Fraser beside him. He'd had a hunch he'd have to go through this at firsthand, a final turn of the torture wheel, and Doug walked up to it.

"My name's Campbell," he said. "Just back from the American Zone. I handled Professor Ehrnstrom's papers there, so I recognized your name. I understand everything went through all right and he's coming over with his daughter. What do you hear from them?"

The bright face changed slightly, like the smallest shift of a kaleidoscope when it is jarred—surprise, of course—and there was a split-second pause while the youth swallowed as Doug had seen fliers do in the war when they got an unexpected assignment. It didn't mean they didn't want it, though. It could just as easily mean they cared too much. Then young Fraser held out his hand and the smile that went with it was the one Doug had dubbed pure Hollywood every time it beamed at him from Elna's desk, but he'd been wrong. With the athlete's tan and build it was all right and the eyes that met his were clear and straightforward.

"Why, of course," John said. "You're the consul Elna wrote about. How"—there was another split-second pause—"how is she?"

"She's all right," Doug answered with the mental postscript, And there, my friend, you have a magnificent understatement.

"Here, let's get a drink and sit down someplace," John Fraser suggested. "I want to hear all about ——"

They moved out into the night, which suited Doug—he couldn't face that youthful perfection much longer—and found chairs on a secluded terrace.

After a word or two about Doug's work and the inevitable interchange of questions about their outfits in the war, which in both cases elicited answers that considerably warmed the atmosphere, John brought the subject back to Elna.

"She said you did a lot to get the doctor through in time. Yes, they're coming together. Land the tenth unless something happens. Again." He gave an apologetic laugh. "I mean there've been so many delays, it's been so long, I can't quite take it in that she's practically on her way."

Doug didn't say anything, but there was something in the air that set his heart soaring. He couldn't see, but he thought John was swallowing again and the next words came with a rush.

"You know, now I've run into you I'd like to ask you something frankly. You're the first person I've seen since I got home that knew Elna and lately—now I'm sure she's really coming—I've begun to wonder. Do you think she'll fit in here? Be happy, I mean? I can't ask anybody else, of course, but you've been working with these German marriages and I thought maybe you could tell me how it . . . generally seems to work out." Doug was still silent and John Fraser ended with an embarrassed, "Skip it, sir. I know I ought to have kept my mouth shut, but I've been . . . worrying all of a sudden."

Doug forgave the elderly "sir" for the sake of the honest young doubt that came through the dark with it and sent his hopes skyrocketing higher. He said carefully, "Last-minute qualms, eh? Well, I guess they're natural, even in ordinary circumstances. And these aren't usual."

"No, they aren't," the other picked up eagerly. "Of course I'm engaged to Elna and we're going to be married and all. She's a wonderful girl and her letters have been—well, wonderful." Doug could imagine it. "I couldn't let Elna down even if I wanted to, but all of a sudden—gosh, it's a relief to spill some of this—all of a sudden she's sort of unreal to me."

There was a rush and rustle behind them and Susie Gwynn's cheerful freckled face peered out the doorway. She wore a crisp, wide-skirted formal, but you could tell that tennis shorts were more her style.

"Mm-hmm, just what I thought. Out with the boys," she said, spotting Johnny. "Where's my punch? That's what you came after, remember?"

John Fraser made the necessary introductions, and at the mention of Germany and Doug's post there the girl gave a little breathy sound, like air escaping a tiny balloon, and the gaiety oozed out of her with it so that she actually sagged a minute. Only a minute, though. She put the smile back on not very successfully and said, "Oh. Excuse it, please. Nice to meet you, Mr. Campbell. See you later, Johnny," and disappeared.

John's eyes followed her and then, feeling Doug's gaze across the path of light from the doorway she'd left open, he turned to face it, saying frankly:

"Don't get this wrong. I don't know what you've heard, but I've known Susie all my life and we're just . . . tennis partners. She sure swings a pretty racket though. That's part of what I mean about Elna, she's no good at games and I don't think she ever saw a squash court. She's so . . . beautiful. I used to tell her in Ober she was too pretty to be true. She sure had me going. Brains too. She's a high-brow, really. Too smart for me all around, and I just wonder if she's going to like this life. She sounds so—her letters sound so . . . different. Of course she is different." Doug thought of Susie's undifferent face and was pretty sure John was seeing it too. "I even got to thinking if it mightn't be a good idea to wait a little while after she gets here instead of getting married right away the way we planned. Sort of get acquainted again in case she's feeling qualms, as you call it, herself and won't say so. You saw her over there—I've been so busy getting this off my chest I haven't even asked about that—but what's your guess?"

Doug still held his tongue. By now it was a literal physical effort, but he wanted the blundering young voice to go all the way, and it did.

In the White World

"I wouldn't hurt Elna for the world," it said. Yes, he was really a good kid or Elna, even at eighteen, wouldn't have fallen for him. "I almost went over to talk to Prof Halvorson at the Institute this week, after I found out everything was really set. He's the one that's bringing the old man—Doctor Ehrnstrom, I mean—over and he's a sort of adopted uncle of Elna's, but I was afraid he'd think ——"

It was the final release from Elna's grave warning and Doug plunged. "That's funny," he said. "I've got an appointment with Professor Halvorson myself tomorrow. Same thing. Advice about what's right for Elna."

It took a minute to register. "Advice about ——" echoed Fraser, and then he got it, and stood up angrily. "Why, you —— Where do you come in on this?"

"Where you go out, I hope," Doug said, trying to make his voice very matter-of-fact. "Keep your shirt on and sit down again while I tell you something. Elna kept her word to you. She told me if I came to tell you the way we feel she'd —— But it was you did the talking." Fraser made an angry sound, but Doug rode over it. "Which you should have. You were bound to change between twenty and twenty-two. Not falling in love, necessarily, the way Elna and I did—and don't think she didn't fight it. She'd have gone through with it just the way you were going to. She still will if you want her to and I'll never let her know we've seen each other. But I think you ought to know she"—Doug's voice shook suddenly—"that she—God knows why—loves me."

There was a silence and then John Fraser gave a deep sigh. "It's the last thing on earth I expected," he said. "Elna's so honest. . . . I can't quite take it in."

"It's true," Doug said. "And if you want to ask any more about ——"

"I want to ask this much right now," John said, and again their eyes met across the bar of light. "How am I sure you're not just working your own side of the street to get her? You may be crazy about Elna. Something tells me you are, but maybe you're pushing it. All's fair in love and so forth." Student Fraser mightn't be a high-brow, Doug decided, but he was a square shooter, as his next words showed. "I've got to be sure it's on her side too. Elna's the kind that would say it was all right to call it off even if ——" John came suddenly to the point. "How can I be sure Elna wants out too?"

It was a fair question and Doug answered it from a memory that was never far from him, telling what was retellable of the farewell at Oberammergau and ending with a husky, "So you see ——"

John Fraser saw. "Ober was a cute place," he said, and ineloquent as the words were, the way he said them put a nice end to the nice story of a nice pair of kids.

Doug took off at dawn next morning, with Speed protesting all the way to the airport. "I thought you were here a few days on the old business," he mourned. "I thought maybe I could help you with it."

"Finished, thanks," Doug caroled, leaping heartlessly aboard the plane.

In New York he wangled himself onto a bomber again. Elna's sailing date blazed ahead of him in letters of fire all the way, but he made it and was standing beside the gangplank of her ship at Bremerhaven when she appeared there, slender and lovely with the little black shoulder cape swinging exactly as he'd been dreaming of her. At sight of him she stood absolutely still.

"No. No," she said, but it had taken her last strength and she stumbled into his arms like a spent runner. "Doug," she sobbed over and over, "Doug, Doug," as if to comfort herself with a word long denied.

A cough brought them back to the dock and the present. "Elna," the Herr Doktor was saying, blowing his nose and wiping his glasses, "you should tell me it is like this with you. We—we make new plans at once."

"There's only one change, but it's major," Doug said, tipping her face down against his shoulder to shut out the anguish and resolve he saw crowding back into her eyes. "You two go on this boat, everything as per schedule, but I'm the fellow that meets and marries you on the other side. I saw John Fraser. . . . Don't look at me like that, my darling. I was so noble you'd never believe it; I give you my word everything's all right."

Elna tried to pull away, her chin lifted very prinzessin, but he held her wrist prisoned in the remembered circle of thumb and finger—it was their old game again—while he tried to extract something from his breast pocket with his other hand.

"Doug, if you have ——"

"I haven't," Doug said. "And here's a letter to you if I can get it from under your left ear here, from a very good guy named Fraser to prove it. I was afraid," he ended with mock reproach, "you wouldn't take my word for it."

She did not smile. "No. I do not," she said. "Even this letter." She glanced at John Fraser's superscription and that little quiver ran across her chin at John's handwriting. "You have told him and he will be generous. So he writes this with perhaps untrue excuses."

"No, Elna," Doug said. "I think it's the tennis girl."

"Ach. So," breathed Elna. The dark lashes fell with infinite relief and then flew wide again. "You do not tell me this, Doug, because I so much wish to believe?"

"Come. Come," said Doug, drawing her close for the sheer joy of having her in his arms again, and this time he knew it was for keeps. "Don't you know when you're a jilted Fräulein? And when that happens Foreign Service takes over. The bond, the responsibility and the girl. Only this time it takes over in person." THE END

YOU LOVE THIS GIRL?

threw the remaining handful of darts aside and, getting up, threw a powder-blue polo coat over her shoulders, snapped off the lights and went down the hall stairs to the street.

She headed down Second Avenue to Eddie's, a little hamburger joint with a white front outside and good coffee inside. On a stool, she ordered the latter. Eddie looked at her long face. He wore a bow tie and a gentle grin. A good man.

"Do you need a good dishwasher, Eddie?" she asked.

"Don't be patronizing, now," he said. "You're too nice for that."

She sighed. "I'm not, Eddie. It's just I'm sick unto death, like they say, of making a living out of my face. It's a nice face. I like it. But I was born with it. Should I be paid just for that?"

He checked the condition of a hamburger being fried alive. "It's nice pay," he said. "But I know what you mean. Why don't you become an actress or something?"

"I don't know if ——" she started to say, but Joe Heston's voice, which had the habit of getting away from him occasionally, interrupted.

"Just another model; in other words—nothing," he said to Abe Renault as they sat at the other end of the counter and after Abe had said hey, how about that dame there, hey?

Joe Heston meant the remark for Abe but it got away, like an outfielder playing a weak single into a home run by letting the ball go through his legs. She turned on her stool, the powder-blue coat flapping gently around her shoulders. It was one thing for her to libel her profession. But for this seedy-looking bravo ——

"And what do you do that's so superior?" she called down to him icily. "Advise Oppenheimer on the right formula for the atom bomb?"

He looked at her and liked what he saw. But you don't abandon your random remarks like orphaned children, even in the face of Dietrich or Garbo.

"In a very mild way I use my brains," he said.

She snorted and you almost could see the steam from her nostrils. Ships at sea reefed their sails; small animals ran for cover. It sounds silly these days to say an angry girl is beautiful, but it still is true.

"I suppose you think all you have to do to be a model is sit in front of a camera and look pretty," she said, supposing correctly but with no intention of admitting it. "I suppose ——"

"Anne Engelking, Joe Heston," Eddie said, wiping the top of a catchup bottle with his damp cloth. "Four rounds at catchweights. Come out fighting."

Joe Heston moved over to the stool next to hers, but she was in full cry.

"I suppose you think a model couldn't make a good living doing something else?" she demanded.

He smiled and said he supposed so and it was like putting another log on the fire.

"I got to go," Abe Renault said. "See you later, Joe."

He left, but you couldn't prove it by them. They sat there face to face, he feeding the lines and she picking them up and answering indignantly. In five minutes they no longer were arguing; they were discussing. In ten, and one cup of coffee later, they had reached the stage of do you really think they'd drop an atom bomb on New York? You do? Well, if —— In fifteen, she knew he was Joe Heston, who wrote The Side Streets for the Afternoon Register, and he had learned about all there was to know of Saginaw.

She knew who he was. She was, matter of fact, a mild admirer of his. She almost never looked at the papers, preferring a couple of pages of Saroyan or Scott Fitzgerald when she had reading time, but it was her own layman's idea that Joe Heston's column was possibly the only literate one in New York.

There is a certain formula, old but true, for the chains of events that follow meetings such as the one in Eddie's, and Emily Anne and Joe followed it. They saw each other just about every day in the week. They kissed each other after the second date—which consisted of a late afternoon spent holding an intelligent conversation with Jimmy the chimpanzee at the Central Park Zoo—and they cut away their assorted acquaintances like so much deadwood.

What was it Cole Porter wrote? We'd have been aware that our love affair was too hot—not to cool down. He lied in his teeth. When you feel what it is Emily Anne and Joe felt, it never will do at all to be satisfied with the kisses of anyone else for so long as you live. Things may happen to your life; a truck may come around a corner on the wrong side of the street and ten minutes later you are alone again in life. Or you might get into a fight and split up and marry someone else, like a fool. But if you feel as they did, no matter what happens after, the gate is closed and the key turned and never for so long as you live will you love anyone else. Not really.

This is a newspaperman and a model, two persons out of eight million in the city of New York, and those are strong words. But it is so. Abélard and Héloïse had no monopoly on the stuff.

There was only one block. Joe's reticence.

"Maybe he's got problems," Eddie suggested one evening before Joe came over from the Register building to pick her up. "Maybe he's got a wife."

"No," Emily Anne said. "He almost had two. He doesn't have any."

"That's a fine thing," Eddie said sorrowfully. "Almost two wives. I like Joe like he was my bookmaker, but he'd have to talk fast and completely to explain almost two wives."

She shook her head and smiled. "Eddie, Eddie," she said reprovingly. "You're not the kind to sit in judgment. I wouldn't love you if you were."

"But almost two wives!"

"He was in the Navy during the war; three days after they had put the Army ashore on one of those South Sea islands, he got a Dear John letter from the girl he was engaged to. She was a girl he had gone to school with, back in Pennsylvania, only the way I put it together, she wasn't quite the right size for the pedestal that men put their girls on. When he was gone from the States eight months, she got mixed up with a saxophone player and the idyl was over."

"I'll bet he won't let anybody say anything about her."

"He won't talk about her," she said. "All I know is that her name was Joan and she must have been crazy not to love him."

"You're prejudiced," Eddie said, putting some toast and coffee in front of her.

"The second time was the bad one, really," Emily Anne said. "It was two years later and he never had seen anybody like her and probably never will. Her name was Millicent Chrystal ——"

"The society dame?"

"Well, yes, but not really. She never wanted any part of that rat race. She was that rarity, a society girl who was human. Only more than human, from what I can figure. She was the kind of girl who'd push a baby out of an automobile's path and get killed instead. Not with any sense of being a martyr, you know, but with a kind of resigned air, like 'This is a fine way to die, damn it, but it has to be done.' You know what I mean, Eddie?"

"She sounds like a saint," he said. "I'm a firm believer that there's saints."

"So am I," she said, "and maybe you're right. Only there was one thing wrong. He found out after a year or so that he didn't love her. He respected her and thought she was wonderful—but he didn't love her."

"Don't kid yourself. If he told you what kind of girl she was, the way you just explained to me, he was in love with her. You lon't have all those stars in your eyes just ›ecause you respect someone."

"No, Eddie," she said, shaking her head. 'You're wrong. He didn't love her. I know. 'm a woman. Believe me, I know."

Eddie went back and looked after the new ›atch of coffee, and wiped off the counter a ittle and opened and closed the cash regis- er, wasting time while he thought, and then ıe came back to where she was sitting as he ›oked at her.

"Well," he said, "what are you wondering ›bout, then? You know what it is. He oesn't want to mess up another girl's life. Ie's been in two tough ones now and he's fraid of a mess. Mostly for the girl who ıight be involved, but partly for himself. Ie's afraid of hurting or getting hurt."

"I guess you're right," she said. "It's a ıame, but I guess you're right." She put the ıoney down for her coffee and started for ıe door; she was going to cross Second Ave- ue and walk slowly toward the Register, to ıeet Joe on the way over. "Well," she said at ıe door, "they also serve who stand and ait."

He grinned at her. "He's in love with ›u, anyway," he said. "You've got more ready than nine tenths of the women in ıis town."

Eddie was right, naturally. Joe Heston, an telligent man with talent, short brown ıir, blue eyes and a faint scar on his cheek ›m falling from a bicycle at age four, had ent a year in the company of Millicent ırystal and made the awful discovery that wasn't in love with her. He was an honest an; not a plaster saint, but an honest man. d that kind doesn't ›ld on to something at isn't right. Somehow had let Millicent ırystal know, and be- use she loved him, e broke their engage- nt.

Emily Anne and Joe did e sophomoric things. ey walked across the ashington Bridge in the moonlight, they le the ferries, they lay on the grass in Cen- l Park reading pages of the early Ernest mingway before he decided to reform the rld. They prowled the city from top to bot- n and they had ham and eggs at six o'clock he morning when the dawn was up over st 54th Street. It was a long, long time ore Joe told her he loved her, and when did, he let it go at that.

I love you," he told her at a champagne ty for some author or other in El rocco, and that was as far as he went.

Not I love you; will you marry me? But he ınt it and she took it gratefully and she, let it go at that. Except for the nights n she lay on the green plaid sofa in the e Second Avenue apartment, after it had n transformed into a bed, and she thought im, lying in his own place off Washington are, and wondered what would happen . . . or ever.

EY concentrated on getting her out of modeling business, and the way they did as by getting a big publishing house to set up in a little bookstore in the Village. It almost everything she wanted out of

You don't know what it means to make a g out of something besides your face," told Kenneth Farrell, the publishing- e president who was a friend of Joe's, n they were signing the legal papers nec- y to open the shop.

Don't be silly," Farrell said. "We're tical people. We're counting on all the gers' buying books from you because re such a pretty girl."

Drop dead," she said amiably.

ne world has moved since mother's day, 't it?

was a little basement store in Waverley e. You went down three steps and you in it. The publishing people rented it ıer, painted it, installed a remarkable tment of best sellers, from Hemingway unt Sarah's Salt Lake Cookbook, and he rest to her. Emily Anne began by putting the Hemingways on a top shelf where nobody could reach them, and concentrating on stacking the near, available shelves with good young authors. She bought a French poodle named Micawber, who lay meditatively all day long on a rag rug next to the fireplace, and she served coffee every afternoon from five to six-thirty.

"I don't mean to be cute or precious," she told Eddie one night when she had gone uptown to meet Joe, "but I want the place to be almost like somebody's home. I want the customers to feel they're borrowing books from a friend."

"Only they pay for them," Eddie said.

"Only they pay for them," she agreed.

It worked. The Village has four thousand phonies per square foot these days, and if you irritate easily they can make your life miserable. Few have talent; the ones that have usually leave after the sale of their first book, painting or sonata. But some have a charm of sorts, and to someone like Emily Anne, with an overdeveloped sense of humor, most of them were marvelously entertaining. She treated them gravely when they came moodily or excitedly tripping down the steps into The Bookstore? (that was the place's name, question mark and all) and enjoyed them immensely. She listened to the tales of genius in creative torture, clucked sympathetically at the complicated and often hilarious stories of amour, neatly fended the passes by the Village wolves—the corduroy-trousered, fiercely bearded ones—and sold books. All this may seem an aimless existence to some of you more concerned with shaping the fate of the world, but remember that Emily Anne Engelking was stepping from an even more fanciful, ether-charged realm, where life consisted of wetting her lips endlessly and saying "prunes" seductively while a cameraman clicked his shutter.

Every cloud has its silver lining, but it is sometimes a little difficult to get it to the mint.

It was fine. It was good. The only flaw to life was that she wasn't married to Joe Heston and there was no sign she ever would be.

Even that, most of the time, was only a small flaw. At least he loved her; she knew that and was sure of it. It was only on gloomy days, when the summer rains dripped down The Bookstore?'s windows like dew on butter, that Emily Anne let it get her down. Those were the days when she felt dark and frustrated and mean, and she took it out on Micawber somewhat maliciously, by reading book reviews to him from the Saturday Review while he winced morosely.

It must have been about the first week in August that the small, dark girl with the pillbox hat and the white piqué suit came down the stairs and into the shop. She made a pretense at browsing for about a minute and then she turned and faced Emily Anne, with a copy of Krafft-Ebing in one hand, somewhat ludicrously.

"How's Joe?" she asked.

"If you mean my Joe," Emily Anne said pleasantly, "he's fine."

The small, dark girl smiled. "He used to be my Joe," she said. "I'm Millicent Chrystal."

Emily Anne said something like oh, and then something like won't you sit down and push Micawber out of the way, he's getting too fat, anyway. They sat for a second, smiling at each other, not quite laughing about the whole thing, liking each other right away.

"I don't know quite why I'm here," Millicent said, "except it's for more than one reason. I was curious about the girl Joe loves. But I suppose I could have contained my curiosity. We have a couple of mutual friends, you see, and they kind of coyly keep me posted on Joe and his life. I've known for months now that you two are in love."

"Well," Emily Anne said a little lamely. "Well, yes."

"One thing has been puzzling me," Millicent said. "Joe isn't a casual man. If he fell in love, he wouldn't hang around for month after month without doing something about it."

"Isn't that what he did when he was in love before?" Emily Anne asked. There wasn't any malice in her tone, just curiosity.

Millicent looked at her. "I don't think he's ever been in love before."

Emily Anne started to say something, but Millicent just grinned and held up her hand a little to stop her.

"You're a lucky girl," she said. "We who are about to die salute you." She looked exasperated. "Why doesn't he marry you?" she asked. "You look clean, intelligent and over twenty-one, and from my snap judgment you're a nice girl. My mother would say, 'Has he got rocks in his head?'"

"He's afraid," Emily Anne said. It was strange how she could talk so directly and frankly to the girl Joe almost married, but she could. "He's afraid he'd mix up my life, although he hasn't said so. Also, I think he's a little afraid of mixing up his own."

"And you wouldn't use your feminine wiles to prod him into it," Millicent said. "I can see that."

A painter of undetermined sex—you could tell he was a painter because he wore a stained smock—came ethereally into The Bookstore? and Millicent sat around fondling Micawber's head while Emily Anne sold him a seven-dollar volume of Van Gogh prints. She rang up the sale, smiled the ethereal one out of the place and then came back to the fireplace.

"He's got to know for sure," she said seriously. "I don't want to push him into anything. I want him to want to marry me, and then I want him to come to me and say it."

"But Joe isn't a fickle guy," Millicent said. "If he fell in love with someone—really in love—he'd stay that way."

Emily Anne smiled sadly at her. "You know it and I know it," she said, "but he doesn't. He's afraid of himself. He's made two big mist——" The words were halfway out of her mouth and she couldn't get them back.

The small, dark girl patted her on the shoulder. "Don't," she said. "I know what you mean. It was a mistake. If ordinary people are permitted tragedies in their lives, that's mine." She took Emily Anne by the shoulders and turned her around. "Look," she said. "I guess I still love Joe. I couldn't fool you about that. You just have to listen to my voice. But what I want for him more than anything is to be happy. And if he loves you as I'm sure he does, the thing that will make him happiest will be to marry you. Agreed?"

"Oh, so agreed," Emily Anne said. "But you're being noble now and I never know how to behave with noble people. I mean, you're being really noble, not phony noble and ——"

Millicent stopped up her mouth with her hand. "Noble, schmoble," she said. "I want him to be happy as much for myself as for himself or for you. He's happy, I sleep better nights." She looked around The Bookstore? uncertainly, then went to the front door, pulled down the shade that said CLOSED on the front, came back to the chair by the fireplace, pulled off her shoes. "How about making us some fresh coffee?" she asked with a grin. "I always solve problems better over coffee."

THEY must have sat there an hour. But who solves problems like that? There are no subtle, complicated approaches. There are only direct lines of action, two or three from which to choose. You finally settle ruefully on one, and so with Millicent and Emily Anne. Emily Anne threw the blue polo coat around her shoulders and followed Millicent out to the little MG roadster at the curb. She looked back at The Bookstore? a little uncertainly.

"I've been leading an academic, cloistered life," she said. "I am more inclined to spend a few months thinking this sort of thing out. I don't want to make a mistake. I ——"

"Time's awastin'," Millicent said. "My great-grandfather, old Commodore Chrystal, made his money by deciding simply which group of people to rob legitimately and then going ahead and robbing them." She looked at Emily Anne. "You can't shilly-shally, darling," she said gently.

"I know," Emily Anne said, climbing into the oversize kiddy car. She sighed. "Damn the torpedoes." She waved bravely forward and they headed uptown.

Occasionally Joe Heston tried to write a masterpiece in his column—they never came out as well as the ones that just fell swiftly and unconsciously into place—and he was engaged on such a project in his corner of the Register city room, with most of the other desks deserted and the floor an abandoned wasteland of scrap paper, when they walked in. Emily Anne never had been in the Register city room, Millicent had been maybe once. To see them come in together, advancing on him like a phoenix arising from the ashes, was, to put it mildly, upsetting.

"Oh, no," he said. He looked at the two women, the one he almost had married, the one he loved. "Hey," he said weakly.

"Hey yourself," Millicent said to him briskly. "Where can we go to talk?"

He looked around, as if expecting to see a board of directors' conference room materialize.

"We could go down to Eddie's," Emily Anne said tentatively. For an independent, mind-of-her-own girl, she was strangely tentative, as if she were in a dream, or at the very least, in the wrong place at the wrong time.

They went to Eddie's, Joe between them, looking from one to the other, wondering if the world had gone mad.

When they entered, Eddie took one swift look, then turned tail and fled down the corridor behind the counter, through the swinging doors into the galley, where he turned and peered through the door porthole.

"You love this girl?" Millicent demanded when they were seated at one of the window booths, in full view of New York.

Joe jumped as if he had been shot through the eyes. "That's a fine question," he said indignantly. "What kind of question do you call that? That's a fine question, I must say."

"I find it hard to believe that you write a literate column, sometimes," Millicent said, shaking her head. "All right, I guess we can take it for granted that you love Emily Anne. And of course she loves you. Now—you don't want to be married, don't you?"

"Marriage is not the normal state of existence for man," Joe said feebly. "Woman is monogamous; man is polygamous."

"Horsefeathers," Millicent said. "You're the kind of man who, if he's in love, wants to be married. The only reason you and I didn't get married was because you didn't love me." She softened for a moment, looking at Joe. "Don't worry about it, baby. I'm all used to it by now. And it's a true fact, as old Commodore Chrystal would say it. We got to face it."

"Did you bring the thumbscrews with you?" he asked weakly, resignedly.

She became all business again. "Suppose she went away right now, this very minute," Millicent said, "and you never saw her again for the rest of your natural days. What then?"

Emily Anne felt she should say something. "Don't think this is completely Millicent's idea. I don't want you blaming her for all this. It's both our ideas."

"It's too demoniacal to be the product of one brain," he said. "Eddie. Oh, Eddie." He cast around wildly, but Eddie was still, sensibly, back in the galley.

"Don't evade the issue," Millicent said. "Suppose this girl did go away and you never saw her again. What would you do then? Answer me!"

FOR a moment he just sat there, completely confused. Then he stood up and exploded. "I'll answer you!" he exploded. "I think this is the most barbaric thing I ever heard of. In all my born days, I never came across so monstrous a scheme. Believe me, you both belong in an insane asylum." He glared down at them. "You—you model! You socialite! What did I ever—ever, ever, ever—do to deserve a visitation from the harpies of the half-world, like this?" And so saying, he slid out from behind the window-booth table and stomped out of Eddie's.

They could see him go through the door and down the street. It was just coming on dusk; the trucks and cabs were rattling hurriedly along Second Avenue, going home or to a quick dinner in a beanery. They watched him disappear down the street in the warm of the August evening. Then they looked at each other.

"You know what they say about all men being small boys at heart?" Millicent said. "It's a lot of bunk. Only not this one. This is the original, real, one-to-a-customer small boy." She smiled at Emily Anne. "And you, honey, are the customer," she said. "Go on, go after him."

"I couldn't," Emily Anne said, doing a little lip biting. "I never ran after a man in my life."

"Liar," Millicent said. "There isn't a woman living who can make that statement."

Emily Anne looked across at her, bridling a moment because she had been called a liar, but it was only reaction. She shook her head and laughed.

"You're so right," she said. "The only difference is the degree of speed, or the tactics you use in running after him."

"Then the question," Millicent said, "is whether Joe Heston is worth this much running after—getting up and leaving another woman, whom you just met tonight and who can give you at best only small talk and some dressmakers' tips, to follow him."

Emily Anne slid out from behind the window-booth table. "You talk silly," she said, "but I see what you mean. Good-by." She started for the door, and halfway there she turned back. "You're quite a girl," she said.

Millicent sighed a mock sigh. "The wrong people always tell me that," she said. She waved Emily Anne on her way and the blond head bobbed through the door and headed in the general direction that the moody dark head had gone a few minutes before.

The East River is a swift-running, turbulent, oily, miserable river, into which bodies embalmed in concrete have been dropped, ships have sunk and murderers have hurled revolvers, the barrels still hot enough to hiss as they struck the water. Drunken drivers have roared across its stringpieces and into its silty depths to watery graves (that is the licensed expression, is it not?); poets have written of it and slum kids have dived into it. Ethereal beauty is not its strong point, but it is New York's own river and Joe Heston accepted it as such. That automatically made it his river. He went to it now, confused and aching in the head, and he stalked angrily out onto a rotting old pier somewhere in the vicinity of the East Fifties. Welfare Island lay bare and uninviting across the water and cars picked their slow way across the Queensboro Bridge. Long Island City, a mysterious area full of warehouses and apartments, sat squatly in the distance.

He lighted a cigarette and sat on the damp crumbling edge of the pier. For a few minutes he did nothing but suck moodily at the cigarette and fall under the ancient spell of the water and the city lights. He couldn't even concentrate on the problem at hand, finding himself slipping into a kind of comatose state that almost made him forget where he was. All he knew was that he was unhappy. The sudden arrival of Emily Anne Engelking made him remember why.

"Joe," she said softly.

He turned.

"Joe, I don't want you to marry me if you don't want to," she said.

The cool, damp river breeze scattered the blond hair softly around the cheeks, which were peaches and cream partly through the kind hand of Nature and partly through the more practical hand of Max Factor.

"It's just that in the first place we can't really drift through life the way it seems to have been lately, because at heart I'm not a genuine Bohemian, even if I do love the Village, and I don't think you are either. And in the second place, I think that if I could exorcise your private ghosts, you'd like being married to me."

He snorted. Sometimes women have to put up with quite a bit. Quite a bit.

"I don't know that I'm the marrying kind," he said defensively. "Sure I'm in love with you. What's that got to do with wanting to marry you? I might be miserable, being tied down to a woman, having to come home every night for dinner. I almost made the fatal mistake twice. Maybe God was just saving me, giving me a hint I shouldn't get married."

"What book did you read that out of?" she demanded with a little snort of her own.

"Go on," he said, standing up and practically yelling, "be flip. You think it's not a big problem, hey? Well, it is." He started peeling off his shirt, ripping his tie in the process. "A woman can be a millstone around a man's neck, you know that, don't you? I want to be free."

She shook her head wearily. A woman proposing to a man shouldn't be subject to corn, she thought doggedly, especially when the man she loves is supposed to be a literate guy who would run a mile from a cliché.

"I want free life and I want fresh air, and I sigh for the canter after the cattle," she keened. "The crack of the whip like shots in a battle, the green beneath ——"

He took no notice of the sarcasm. "You know what I want to be able to do? I want to be able to get up from my desk in the Register office any afternoon and say, 'I think I'll go to California.' Or, 'I think I'll go to Bangkok.' Do you think I could do that if I was married to a woman who just bought two dollars' worth of sirloin steak and would have a fit if she got it into the broiler only to discover I wasn't coming home for three months? Do you think I could do that, hey?"

He thrust his face close to hers belligerently and she resisted, with a bit of effort, kissing it. Then he shucked off the shirt, kicked off his loafer shoes and poised on the stringpiece of the pier.

"How many wives," he demanded loudly, "would understand it if their husbands decided they didn't want to come home that night but wanted to go for a swim in the East River?"

There is only small doubt that he intended to jump into the river anyway to drive home his point, but his entrance into the melancholy waters was a bit premature. He was going to do a swan dive, or a rough facsimile, but in turning around to get ready to do it majestically, one foot slipped and the next thing you knew one of his ears was entering the East River, to be followed in short order by the rest of him. Two tramps cooking mickies in a fire under the pier looked out at him meditatively and wondered why he hadn't removed his pants.

"I want to be able to ——" he began yelling up to her while doing a ridiculous dog paddle, but he glugged on a mouthful of river water. When he finally got all clear, he just paddled around doggedly and glared up at the pier.

Emily Anne Engelking, who liked a swim as well as the next man, eyed the next man resignedly and dubiously. Then with a sigh she kicked off her shoes, peeled off her blue polo coat, stood there for a moment in blouse and slacks, and dived in after him.

"What do you call"—glug—"that?" Joe demanded, overcoming without a great deal of trouble the first urge to rescue her, when he saw she could swim better than he. "A gesture? That's a gesture, I suppose?"

She pushed a floating piece of driftwood out of her way and then turned over on her back and swam lazily around in circles, staring nonchalantly up at the August moon.

"Sometimes," she said, shaking her head, "you sound like a cracked phonograph record. Just exactly why do you think I want to get married, anyway? To settle down? To forget there's a world going on outside the kitchen, and to wrap my troubles up in an apple pie? To whine at you on Saturday nights, 'Harry, we never go nowhere no more'?"

"My name's Joe," he said, sullenly and logily. The river was cold, even if it was midsummer. Maybe wives wouldn't understand it if their husbands wanted to jump into it instead of coming home, but a quick study of this particular situation seemed to disclose the prospective wife as being much happier than the prospective husband about it all.

She looked up at the stars and talked to them. "I'm in love with you," she said, and her voice was small and serious, "and you're in love with me. At least you say you are, and we do have that naïve pact not to lie to each other. These days, the natural course of events like that leads to marriage. The minute you get tired of me, I want you to get up and go to Bangkok, and the minute you fall out of love with me, I just want yo to get up and go. I know you're afraid o messing up some girl's life because you'v had your fingers burned twice, but I als know that it's my life." She stole a look a him, floundering around, trying to tell him self that all bodies have buoyancy, all bod ies should float. "Let me worry abou whether it's a mistake, Joe."

Here was a man with his defenses all down His ears were full of river water and he ha that empty feeling that comes from havin your arguments shot away. She was right, o course. Perfectly, completely right. Whe his teeth began to chatter a little, he finall looked at her with that violent glare tha American men reserve for special occasion such as when they are letting their wome know they love them.

"Will you marry me?" he said, shakin as if he had the ague. And then, not waitin for an answer, "And for Pete's sake, help m out of this nogoodnik of a river?"

Managing a kiss in the East River is a achievement, but Emily Anne Engelkin was a good swimmer and she achieved i Then they paddled slowly toward shor from which vantage point the two bake of mickies looked out at them curiously.

"Ah, I was in love myself, once," one o them said to the other, but all the other or did was stir up the fire and try to shove th bigger of the two potatoes around so it sat i the flames nearest him.

LESSON IN LOVE

The McDonalds' strongest allies in conquest of daughter's cerebral palsy: faith and determination.

By ROGER BUTTERFIELD

At home in Teaneck, New Jersey, daily exercise to retr undamaged muscles is vital part of twelve-year-old Dian spirited fight. Big moment last June: sixth-graders' pro

THE first time I got to know Diane McDonald was on a hot afternoon last summer when she and some other kids in Teaneck, New Jersey, were out in their bathing suits on a neighbor's lawn squirting water on one another with a hose. Diane is twelve, but looks a year or two younger; she has curly auburn hair and a creamy skin that freckles easily, and a smile that lights up her face like sunshine.

When you see Diane's smile you understand why she has made such an outstanding success of her life thus far, despite the fact that her right leg and left arm have been partly paralyzed since birth by the little-known and often misunderstood affliction which is called cerebral palsy.

On this particular afternoon Diane was laughing and jumping around in pure joy while one of the older boys doused her with water. When she saw her mother and me coming down the street, she broke away and ran toward us. Or rather, I should say she skipped toward us, for Diane does not run in the usual sense. She takes quick, short steps with her knees and ankles close together and her arms spread out for balance, like someone trying to hop across a narrow board suspended high in the air. This kind of locomotion

PHOTOGRAPHS BY VICTOR JORGENSEN

DEAR EDITORS: For the first two years after I discovered my daughter was partly paralyzed from a birth injury, I lived with a broken heart. It seemed as though everything had frozen inside me: that I could never be really happy again. I realize now that this was because of my own personal disappointment—I had wanted so much to have a little girl, and to teach her to dance as I did.

But after those first two years I found that Diane was giving me something that few mothers can have—a depth of love and a closeness that can exist only under special circumstances. Her courage and her quick intelligence have completely erased my former bitterness. I am prouder of Diane now than most parents can ever be, because she has conquered so much. Whatever I have contributed, she has given me back a hundredfold.

My work for other children with cerebral palsy has also been of the greatest importance in my life. I have seen busy businessmen and society women and union carpenters and nurses and others, all giving up their own good time and money to help the helpless children of their neighborhoods. It is an inspiration I would never have had without Diane. It has taught me the most important lesson of all—that to live for one's own happiness is the definition of selfishness. True happiness, I believe, comes from living for others.

—RHEA COLEMAN MCDONALD

Often painful to Diane is special exercise for stretching, training unused muscles of "Leftie," the family's name for her left arm. Her right leg is also affected.

At free horse show for cerebral-palsied children, Diane's big thrill was pony-cart ride. Conscious always of her faulty balance, she leaves cart carefully, but can't avoid a fall. Friends respect McDonald rule, let her pick herself up, and, embarrassed and distressed, she moves away from crowd of normal children.

Intense fear of heights makes ladder climbing the most difficult and disliked of Diane's exercises.

Diane has the often unpredictable, complex problems of the child who is "different."

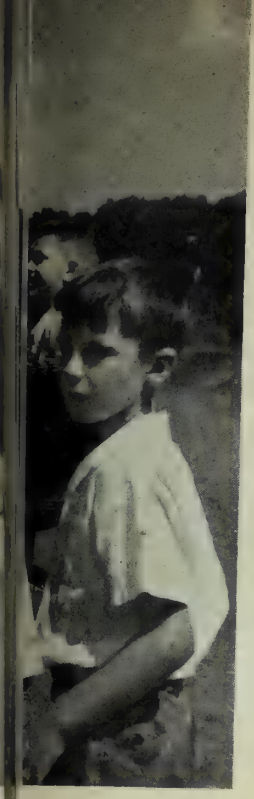
is uncertain at best, and when Diane was only a few steps away from the other kids the inevitable thing happened—she tumbled headfirst on the sun-baked ground.

It was a good hard spill that knocked the wind out of her and smeared her right elbow with blood and dirt. For just an instant as Diane looked up her face was white and strained. But when she saw that her playmates were ignoring her, the confident smile came back, and she scrambled to her feet.

"That was a beauty, wasn't it?" she laughed, when she reached us. "I thought I was all through with that business for this afternoon."

When her mother touched the bleeding elbow Diane winced and twisted her arm around to survey the damage.

"Oh, no, not that!" she exclaimed. "And I just put on a new Band-aid. I'll have to get Mrs. Leers to give me another one." And off she skipped to the back door to get herself patched up.



From the day when she took her first step alone Diane's knees and elbows have never been free from scars and bandages. But to those who know her, these things are the badges of high courage and a great achievement. They mean that in spite of her painful lack of muscular control, Diane has never stopped trying to walk, climb stairs, and even run and play in a close-to-normal manner. There have been days in the past when she fell thirty or forty times; now it may be only three or four times, and on some red-letter days she does not fall at all.

At the new clinic, Diane works at perfecting her balance while walking, under the watchful eyes of her mother and Mrs. Donald Clough, therapist. Rhea is tireless publicity chairman of the Cerebral Palsy League she helped organize.

Today Rhea makes all her daughter's clothes, but at Diane's age she was a "child wonder" toe dancer on her way up. The theater brought stage manager Ed McDonald, dancer Rhea together, began new marriage career for Rhea.

Diane's great love at the moment is horses, with Girl Scout activities a close second. After seeing Smoky, the Wonder Horse, perform during show, she longs to pet him, struggles against her fear of falling.

Typically, Diane's high courage wins out. Letting her daughter resolve her own conflicts is never easy for Rhea. "But I force myself not to help. That would take away her hard-won independence."

Last June, when she was graduated from the James Russell Lowell grade school in Teaneck, Diane attended the "junior prom" which was held by her class, and four of the boys invited her to dance. There was only one fall that evening, and it really wasn't Diane's fault. One of the boys was a bit awkward in leading her back to her table, and tripped her accidentally.

Perhaps the biggest reason why Diane now handles herself so well, and is still improving, is that she has an exceptional mother. Mrs. George McDonald loves her daughter with a special tenderness, as the mothers of handicapped children often do. But she has steeled herself to express her love in ways that are helpful and realistic, instead of purely protective. She realized very early that falling was going to be a major part of Diane's education, and that it would do no good to get

Diane practices reluctantly, but her parents hope cornet lessons will help develop better sense of timing.

Ed, more inclined to aid Diane than to let her work out difficulties the hard way, carries her piggyback through brush at the New Hampshire vacation spot.

Irregular hours demanded by his job as technical director of New York City's Roxy Theater limit Ed's time with Diane. During baseball season they make a point of viewing games via television in playroom which Ed pine-paneled.

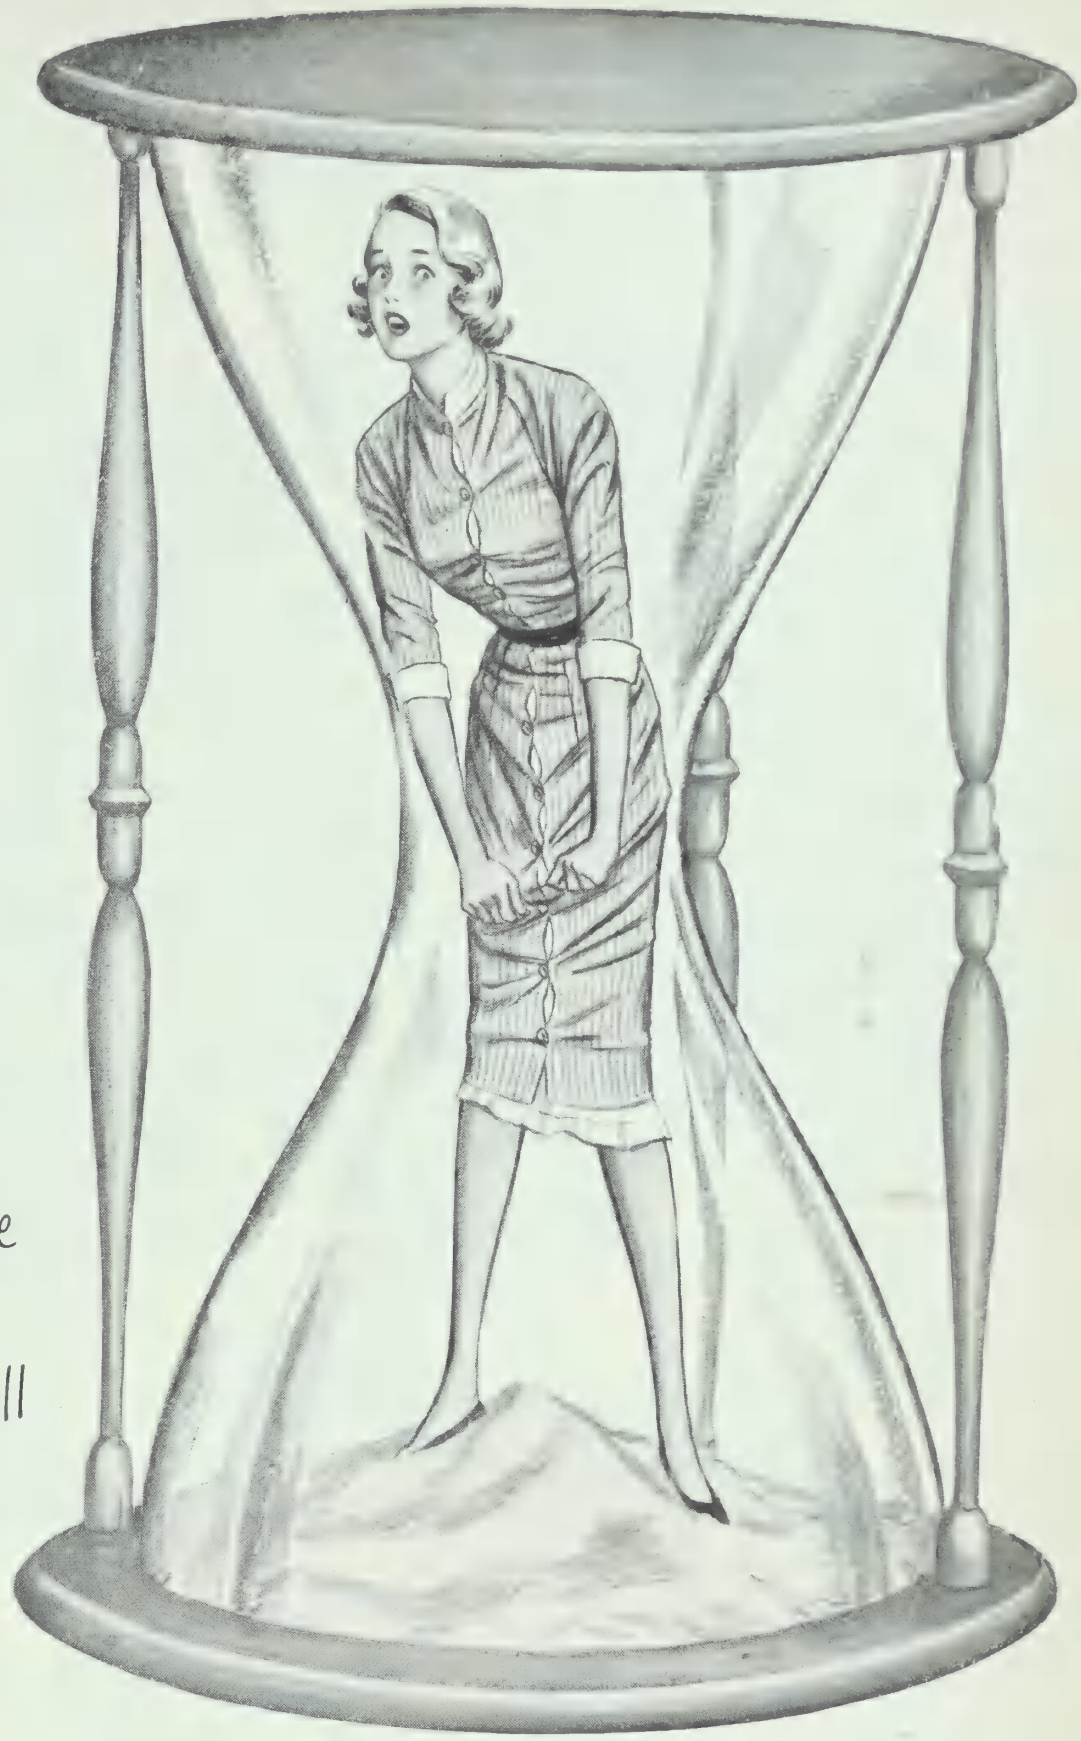
George, Jr., 21, sheds Army uniform during furlough, offers proof of his mother's excellent cooking to Ed Poupart, buddy from Wisconsin. Rhea hopes George will continue chemical-engineer studies after service discharge, but predraft work with father stimulated interest in the theater.

Diane looks to the future with enthusiasm of any alert, intelligent adolescent, plans to be pediatrician. Past adjustment and steady optimism promise rewards, and useful life, helping others as she has been helped.

Here is unwavering courage and hope—and no room for bitterness.

excited about it, or show her sympathy every time it happened. In fact, children like Diane are grateful when their mishaps are not noticed. So the McDonald family has made it a rule that whenever Diane falls down she has to pick herself up, no matter how bruised and bloody she may be. Her best friends and neighbors also observe this rule.

For her parents and her big brother, George, Jr., this seemingly Spartan attitude has meant many heartbreaking moments. Rhea (her mother) will never forget, for instance, the first time Diane went out to play in the snow. She was six years old then, and had been watching through the window as the other children dashed around and threw snowballs at one another.



"She begged so hard that I let her go, even though I knew she couldn't keep her little feet under her," Rhea remembers. "I dressed her and closed the side door behind her, and went into the living room where I could see her through a window. She had only fifteen feet to go to reach the front yard. But in those fifteen feet she fell fifteen times. I stood there with tears running down my cheeks and my arms just aching to go out and lift her up. But I knew I could not do that; I could not rob her of a new achievement.

"When I looked again she was out front, crawling and rolling most of the time, but laughing and throwing handfuls of snow in the air. From that day on she has never been afraid of the snow."

For the same reasons, the McDonalds have never put a handrail on their staircase, scene of some of Diane's worst spills.

"Our doctor told me I was cruel when he came to treat Diane for her third concussion on those stairs," says Rhea. "I know such things are hard for other parents to understand. Even now Diane never starts upstairs that my heart doesn't follow her—stopping breathless wherever I am—wondering if I will hear her foot on the next step, or the thud of a fall.

all-in-1 dinners

By LOUELLA G. SHOUER

RHEA McDONALD cooks to please her man—whenever he's at home. He likes double-thick steaks (an order less frequently filled of late), veal cutlets cooked until they practically fall apart, and fried or fricasseed chicken.

"I used to be very generous with my table. Now it's getting beyond our purse to eat as we used to," admitted Mrs. McDonald ruefully. "I can stretch a chicken farther than you can imagine."

Though Mr. McDonald has only mild enthusiasm for most casserole dishes, he eats this combination of chicken and rice heartily. "I usually keep the cooked chicken breasts for à la king," Rhea explained. "The bones go to the soup pot, the rest of the meat in the casserole."

PALO ALTO CHICKEN CASSEROLE

Cook a 4-pound chicken in 3 cups water with an onion, celery leaves and 1 teaspoon salt until tender. Cool. Save the stock. Remove chicken meat from the bones. Take the skin and bones, add seasonings and water and cook up for more stock. It's good to have around. Melt 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Blend in 2 tablespoons flour. Add 1¼ cups chicken stock, 1 cup milk, ¼ teaspoon onion salt, a generous pinch of dry mustard, 1¼ teaspoons salt, and a sprinkling of pepper. Mix 2 cups cooked rice (use the precooked rice—it's quick and easy) with 2 tablespoons chopped pimiento, ½ cup toasted slivered blanched almonds and ⅓ cup sliced canned or cooked mushrooms. Cut chicken into bite-size pieces, saving the breasts for sandwiches, a salad, chicken curry or à la king another day, as Mrs. McDonald does. Mix with rice, seasonings and sauce. Pour into a casserole. Sprinkle with buttered cracker or bread crumbs. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 35 minutes. Serves 4. When you're having company, double the recipe and use the whole chicken.

Diane's choice. When Diane has her chance to choose the dinner special, the budget really gets a break, for Diane is hungriest when the dish for dinner is contrived with ground meat or frankfurters—and anything in the stew family suits her fine. Have you ever eaten Sauerbraten, the German pot roast with its spicy flavored gravy? The same seasonings do as much for a beef stew as they do for a pot roast. Turn up the piano stool, Diane, and get your practicing done; we're going to put on the stew.

BEEF STEW MARINADE

This stew isn't a quick and easy. It's easy enough, but you have to have a hankering for it a day in advance to have it taste its best. Have 2 pounds stewing beef cut into about 1½" cubes. They won't be in perfect cubes, but you can tell the butcher you want it for stew and he will usually hit it about right. Let it marinate overnight in the following spice: Heat ½ cup vinegar and ½ cup water. Add 1 clove garlic, cut into slivers, 2 teaspoons salt, ½ cup sliced onions, 1 bay leaf, 12 whole black peppers or about ¼ teaspoon ground pepper, and 1 teaspoon sugar. Pour over the beef. Cover and let stand in the refrigerator overnight. So much for this, the most important part.

To make the stew, drain the meat very well. Brown it on all sides in 3 tablespoons shortening or salad oil in your favorite stewing pot. When brown and glazy, add ½ cup of the strained marinade that you drained off the beef and 2½ cups water. Cover tightly and simmer until meat is near to tenderness. Then add 1½ cups peeled small white onions and 4 carrots scraped and cut into bite-size chunks. Finish simmering until vegetables are tender. Thicken the juices with a little flour and water blended smooth. Serve in a deep dish with fluffs of snowy mashed potatoes on top. This will serve only 4, if you like a stew with plenty of meat in it.

Leave it up to George. If the meal planning were left up to young George, he'd probably have broiled chopped steak every night in the week. But he votes for his mother's version of veal paprika, too, and an honest one-piece meal of dried Lima beans, cooked with the shank end of a ham or a smoked pork butt, wins hands down.

LIMA-BEAN POT

Pick over 1 pound large dried Lima beans. Add 6 cups water. Bring to boil. Boil 2 minutes. Let stand 1 hour. This does just as much for tenderizing the beans as an overnight soak. Now put the beans on to cook with one of those good boneless smoked-pork butts, weighing about 2 pounds or more. Add 2 more cups water, 2 onions, chopped, ⅓ cup diced celery, 1 tablespoon brown sugar, 1 teaspoon dry mustard and 1½ teaspoon salt. Cover and simmer 2½ hours. The beans will be deliciously flavored by then and both the beans and the pork will be fork-easy tender. Slice the meat and serve over the beans. As Rhea would do, sprinkle a little chopped parsley over the top, for color! Serves 4–6, depending on the heartiness of appetites.

Family pot. If you're planning a baked ham for any of your holiday affairs, hang onto the ham bone, for as the year rounds the corner, the grocery bill will have had about all you can afford to give it. That's the time for a big tureen of ham-bone soup that's a really special meal with a salad and a dark pumpernickel bread.

Split-pea soup gets the ham bone almost too often. This one has split peas in it, too, but it's an even tastier brew—a potpourri of many vegetables. Annie, one of the helpers in our JOURNAL kitchen, and Scotch herself, makes this whenever we have a ham bone.

All the McDonalds are soup fans. "My husband is keen about thick soup. Sometimes I just mash it with the potato masher," Mrs. McDonald told us. But Annie's Scotch soup is thick enough for Mr. McDonald without being mashed, as it has barley and all sorts of vegetables in it.

ANNIE'S SCOTCH SOUP

Put the ham bone in the soup kettle with 3 quarts water, ¼ cup each whole dried Scotch peas, lentils, navy beans, split peas, and 2 tablespoons medium barley. If you're a soup maker for sure, you keep such provender on your cupboard shelves. Double up on split peas, though, if Scotch peas can't be had. Simmer, untended, 1½ hours. Chop 3 large onions and cook until golden in 3 tablespoons butter or margarine. Add to the soup with ¼ cup chopped celery, ¾ cup chopped celery leaves, 1 carrot, cut medium fine, 4 carrots, grated, 2 green onions, if available, chopped, top and all, and ¾ cup diced white turnip. Simmer slowly another hour to hour and a half. Remove the ham bone. Skim off the fat that comes to the top. Season to taste with salt and pepper and sprinkle 2 teaspoons chopped parsley over the top just before serving.

"I'm a food detective." Mr. McDonald has dinner in town frequently and is always hunting out new restaurants. When he comes home and raves about a dish but can't describe it, this is Rhea's cue to wangle an invitation to the same restaurant for a taste and a little detective work.

For instance, their now favorite way to make chicken fricassee was one of her finds. The sauce was pale yellow, faint of curry. She figured out that it probably had an egg yolk beaten into the gravy too. With a little experimenting, she hit it just right. Another dish Rhea had good luck in duplicating was a sea-food au gratin she had eaten many times in a sea-food restaurant. The secret was Worcestershire sauce.

"We're a great family for soups—particularly the thick, fill-'em-up kind."

LESSON IN LOVE

"But I have forced myself not to help her, for that would have taken away her hard-won independence. Over the years she has improved so much that now she can climb almost any stairs without help. I know that if she is in some strange house or building she will not fall because of reaching for a rail that isn't there."

Sometimes, of course, Diane has been so badly hurt that the self-help rule could not apply. She has had five concussions, and on one terrible day, when she fell from a bicycle, her skull was fractured. When she was small her dread of falling was so intense that unless her parents supported her, her whole body would stiffen with fear, and topple over backward. That landed her on the unprotected back of her head.

To minimize this danger, her mother began giving Diane falling lessons almost as soon as she could walk. She would spread pillows on the floor, and show Diane how to drop headfirst with her arms covering her face. Using a broomstick, she prodded gently at the back of Diane's knees to get her used to the feeling of collapsing in a forward direction. They called this "crumbling up," and made a cheerful game of it.

Another lesson Rhea instilled at the same time was, "We never cry when we fall." Diane learned this so thoroughly that she still treats her every tumble as a kind of joke. From the psychological (and even medical) standpoint, this is of great importance. If Diane had learned to feel sorry for herself—or if she felt that other people were nervous about her, and continually fussing over her—she could never have made the progress she has.

I have said that Diane's paralysis is due to cerebral palsy, and I want to explain this more fully. Cerebral palsy is caused by destruction of certain cells in the brain, often (as in Diane's case) by an injury at birth. Sometimes the lost cells are those which should control the arm and leg muscles, or those of the face and throat, or even some of the senses. In severe cases all the organs of motion and speech may be affected.

Because brain cells cannot be repaired or replaced, there is no complete "cure" for cerebral palsy. However, by various kinds of therapy, other brain cells can be trained to do the jobs of the missing ones, and the injured person can gain some control of his muscles. This control is always a matter of deliberate effort. In moments of excitement or fear it is apt to vanish suddenly.

A distinguished physician, Dr. Earl R. Carlson, who is himself afflicted by cerebral palsy, has described with grim humor in his book, Born That Way, the effects this may have on the simplest acts of living. Once, while reading aloud in a college classroom, Doctor Carlson's arm gave a sudden jerk and hurled his book across the room. Another time, when he was handed a cup of tea while visiting friends, he tossed cup, saucer, tea and all over his shoulder!

Such spasmodic movements, and the blurred speech which is characteristic of many cerebral-palsied persons, are the results of their supreme efforts to handle themselves and communicate with the outside world. About 70 per cent of all cerebral palsy victims who live beyond infancy have normal or superior intelligence, and the children, especially, are as sensitive and affectionate as normal youngsters. Yet to outward appearances their erratic behavior might stamp them as complete morons or worse.

In the whole range of human ills it is difficult to imagine a more tragic plight.

Diane's case, as it happens, is one of the lighter ones. She has no facial distortions, and she has always been able to talk in a natural way. The first real sign came when she was five months old, and reached out to grab her bottle. Her right hand closed around it properly, but when she tried to use the left her whole arm would thrash around aimlessly, or become helplessly rigid. At the age when most babies begin to sit up, Diane's back muscles would not support her, and she had to be tied to her high chair with a soft towel or diaper.

In other ways Diane was a bright and enterprising baby. The first time she saw a spoon she tried to take it in her "good" hand and feed herself. She ate heartily, laughed and made all the usual baby sounds, and was eager to play and crawl around. But it was apparent very early that she would have much trouble in standing erect or walking. She lacked control of her right leg, which buckled under her, or got in the way of the other one, and tripped her.

All her limbs looked healthy, and her nervous reactions certainly were. When the local pediatrician stuck pins in her paralyzed left arm, she howled with pain and righteous indignation. He finally threw up his hands and admitted he could not diagnose her condition. (This was back in 1940, when the facts about cerebral palsy were known to only a few pioneering specialists. Today most doctors are aware that "C.P." can be successfully treated in a majority of cases.)

For Rhea McDonald and her husband the thought that their baby daughter might be crippled for life was at first an agony almost too great to bear. Both parents had been virtually raised in the theater, where physical grace and skill were an essential part of their lives. Rhea had gone on the stage as a "child wonder" toe dancer at the age of eight in Newburgh, New York. From then until she married at nineteen she danced her way across Canada and the United States and back, usually in vaudeville specialty acts. During the winters she went to school in Brooklyn. From May to October she "hit the road."

Rhea's mother had been a talented dancer, too, but she had never been allowed to perform in public. She expressed a lifetime of frustrated ambition by rigorously coaching Rhea for many hours each day, and by watching even more rigorously over her personal life. During her high-school years Rhea was allowed few contacts with boys. Her mother did not want her to fall in love until she reached the top of her profession. She dreamed of making her the première danseuse of a famous European ballet.

At sixteen Rhea quit school and joined a road show run by a popular song writer named Anatole Friedland. Her job was to provide toe-dance interpretations while Mr. Friedland played some of his songs on the piano. Her bosom friend on this trip was another young dancer named Dorothy McNulty, who is now better known as Penny Singleton, of the "Blondie" shows. Dorothy's violet eyes and naturally dark tresses were in perfect contrast to Rhea's rosy cheeks and wavy auburn hair; the two girls made a striking and appealing couple.

The trip was the first Rhea ever made without her mother. By a not too strange coincidence it was also the one on which she met her husband. Diane's father, George Edward McDonald, comes from a family whose associations with the theater go back to the last century. His father, P. J. McDonald, built the stage settings for the great all-time hit, Ben Hur, and founded a firm of theatrical constructors which is still a leading one on Broadway. As a boy George toiled in the family workshop, helping build sets for Ziegfeld's Follies and other famous shows. But he was too restless a spirit to be pinned down to business, and became a free-lance "set man" on his own. He ran things backstage for George White and Noel Coward and many other producers, and is now technical director of the Roxy Theater show in the heart of midtown New York.

When George first went to work for his father, the foreman told him, "I've got three other Georges working here and they all earn a dollar an hour. I can't have them dropping their tools every time I want you. So I'll use your middle name and call you Eddie." This nickname stuck and became well known in the theatrical business. When Rhea reported

r her first rehearsal with the Friedland ow, "Eddie" McDonald was already ere, as stage carpenter and general prop- ty boss. He seemed quite a man of the orld to her. slender, red-haired and Irish- oking, with a grin and a bit of blarney r all the girls. (Actually he was twelve ars older than she was.)

Rhea's mother had allowed her to make is trip alone only if she had an official aperon. This job was given to the middle- ed wardrobe mistress, Marie. Dorothy as also under Marie's sharp-eyed supervi- on. But Eddie was an old and trusted end of Marie. Before long he and Marie d the girls were enjoying breakfast to- ther daily, and often supper as well.

At New Haven, their first stop, a couple young Yale men were waiting at the stage or for Rhea and Dorothy, but Marie ned them down flat. wo years later Rhea's mother died, and a passed her eighteenth birthday. Eddie eged her with phone calls, flowers dates letters. One day he arrived at her home taxicab and insisted she come with him nce. He had to leave that night with a show for Philadelphia and Washington. xplained, and the trip could be their eymoon. Rhea got in the cab—"with what I had on"—and they were mar- in New York's City Hall. That was on ember 15, 1928, and it marked the end hea's dancing career.

IR first baby, a boy named George, ar- l in 1930. The delivery was long and rult, and George was a sickly baby he was three months old. After that icked up rapidly, and is now a 6′ 3″ er in the U. S. Army. He attended Ford- Prep and Penn (for two years) and then to work alongside his father at the , where he learned to operate the giant rical switchboard in a matter of hours. on after he was born, Rhea's New York or advised her against having another unless by Caesarean section. "You aren't built to have children," he told This was hard to take, for Rhea found joy in her first baby. She yearned to have another one, especially as George grew older and, in boyish fashion, more independent. When he was nine she decided she could wait no longer.

By this time the McDonalds had moved to Teaneck, a residential suburb just across the Hudson River from New York. The doctor there listened to Rhea's story and nodded his head when she told him she wanted a Caesarean. But when the time came he ordered a normal birth, which was even more difficult than the first. Diane was delivered by forceps. It was doubtless then that she received the hidden trouble-causing injury.

AT first her condition was not noticed, for muscular actions during the early months are erratic, and Diane simply waved her arms and legs like other babies. But something about the way she clenched her tiny left fist, and jerked her right leg, worried her mother. She asked the doctor about it, but he told her she was "imagining things."

The first real clue came from Rhea's father, Joseph Coleman, a remarkable man who spent many years as head nurse in the men's psychiatric ward of New York's Bellevue Hospital. The orphaned son of a Hudson River barge captain who was drowned in an accident, Mr. Coleman worked his way through two years of medical school before he quit to get married. But he continued his study of medicine through books, and his experiences at Bellevue—where a major part of his job was writing down the words of murderers who claimed to be insane—had taught him more about abnormal behavior than many doctors know. After observing Diane for some time he told Rhea, "The trouble is in her head. She is trying to use her arm and leg in the right way, but the message isn't getting through."

Which, in ordinary language, is an excellent description of cerebral palsy!

With her father's help Rhea obtained an appointment with one of the leading child specialists in New York. This elderly doctor spent more than an hour examining Diane, and told her mother, "It is very clear to me that she has been injured at birth. It is a situation as old as civilization itself, but we are just beginning to understand it, and do something about it. I would like you to see Doctor Carlson at the Neurological Institute."

Rhea's first impression of Doctor Carlson was rather frightening. A huge man with twitching shoulders and thick speech, he peered at Diane with eyes like black dots behind enormously thick glasses. (I have mentioned earlier that Doctor Carlson has cerebral palsy himself.) Almost his first words seemed unnecessarily harsh.

"You must not feel so badly," he told Rhea. "You are one of the more fortunate parents!"

"I looked at him, and the tears came to my eyes," Rhea recalls. "I thought, 'How can he be so cruel?' But I understood when he took me down to his clinic to see his special cases.

"There was one nine-year-old girl, with big blue eyes and the face of an angel, who was just a limp bundle of flesh in her mother's arms. Yet they all had the capacity to

The Problem of Cerebral Palsy

NEARLY 10,000 children with cerebral palsy are born in the United States each year, according to a leading authority. Of these, about 1400 are doomed to die in infancy; 30 per cent of those who live will be mentally defective because of their brain injury. The remaining 70 per cent will have normal or better intelligence, with physical handicaps ranging from mild to severe.

It is known that there are at least 300,000 cerebral-palsied persons under 35 in this country, and at best 75 doctors qualified to treat them. Equally disturbing is the fact that satisfactory clinical facilities are available to only about 2500.

If you would like further information on this subject write to the National Society for Crippled Children and Adults, Inc., 11 South LaSalle Street, Chicago 3, Illinois. Through the sale of Easter Seals and other methods the National Society pays for the treatment of the cerebral palsied—and other handicapped persons—in many parts of the country.

"A year ago, I started out to buy the most beautiful and the very best range I could find," says Mrs. Calvin J. Smith of Los Angeles. "I found it in my new automatic Gas range! It's a miracle-worker . . . I set a clock, and it turns itself on, cooks a complete, delicious dinner while I'm away for the afternoon, and turns itself off! And how I love the fact that my range is as easy to clean as a china dish . . . and that my pans and wallpaper stay so clean!"

"I'm director of the Washington (D.C.) School of Cooking," says Miss Emma T. Watts. "We naturally use Gas ranges in our classes because that's what most of our pupils have in their own homes. We feel, too, that foods cooked properly by Gas are unsurpassed in looks, flavor, and nutrition. Meats broiled by live flame, cakes baked in the exact, even heat of a Gas oven, vegetables cooked the waterless way . . . these are the good things good cooks get with Gas!"

think and feel, and definite hope of improvement. That was why Doctor Carlson was willing to take them.

"As I closed the door of that little room I said a silent prayer to be allowed to give my life to helping cerebral-palsied children. It was the beginning of a brand-new life for me; it brought me out of the shadows I was in."

Following Doctor Carlson's directions, Rhea began giving Diane several hours of exercise every day, placing her on her back on the kitchen table and moving her legs in an imitation of walking. Once a week she drove and carried her to the institute in New York for more intensive therapy. When Diane was two her back was strong enough to hold her in a sitting position. When she was three she could toddle along when half lifted by a harness. Eddie, her father, built her a special tricycle for her second birthday: it had high supports around the seat and straps on the pedals to keep her feet from flying off. Diane's eagerness to ride this was a big help, for the pedaling helped to educate her muscles in the reciprocal motions which palsied children lack.

Doctor Carlson had told Rhea, "If she can take one step, she can learn to walk." At four she took her first unaided step. At five she was allowed outdoors alone, but stayed close to the front yard. Sudden noises have magnified effects on persons with palsy, and every time Diane heard an auto horn she would fall down with fright. The first time she went out in the rain the drops falling on her umbrella sounded "like bombs" to her, and she fell.

Despite these hazards, Rhea was determined that she should be on her own as much as possible. She taught her how to answer sympathetic strangers—"I am learning to walk. My leg was hurt when I was born!"

Once a woman on the next block asked her, "What is this cerebral palsy? I never heard of it."

"I'll show you," said Diane, tottering back and forth on the sidewalk. "It's what I've got!"

In addition to the tedious physical workouts, Rhea spent much time every day reading, singing and telling Diane stories about the flowers and animals they saw through the windows. "I wanted to be sure she had her share of mental stimulation," she says. They made a game of buttoning clothes, which is not an easy thing to learn with one hand. Putting on shoes and stockings was even harder. When she was five Diane still took two hours to dress herself in the morning. Rhea would hear her, from her own bedroom, fumbling for socks in her dresser as early as six A.M. She had to start then to be ready for breakfast at eight.

Later on, Rhea instituted "dancing lessons" for Diane and other small girls in the neighborhood. They were mostly stretching exercises to phonograph music on the living-room floor, but Rhea explained that many dancers often start that way (which they do). This led to staging plays in the game room of the McDonald home. Diane's lively imagination showed itself when she made corsages for all the young actresses, kept them in the refrigerator, and presented them after the final "curtain."

The bathroom, of course, presented special dangers, especially when Diane was smaller. But for several years her mother has not helped her there. The important rule is that Diane never starts running her bath water until she is safely seated in the tub, and does not climb out until the water is drained. This reduces the risk of slipping.

Before Diane entered school at the age of seven her mother took her to the Neurological Institute for psychological and encephalographic tests. These showed that she had no unhealed injuries in her brain, and a higher-than-average I.Q. The institute specialists recommended that Diane enter first grade directly, as she was mentally beyond the kindergarten period. The Teaneck school authorities refused to permit this, however, so Diane has always been somewhat ahead of most of her class in studies.

At first her greatest trial in school was the alarm bell which rang loudly before and after each period. If she was in the corridor when the bell rang, she would stiffen up and fall. To overcome this, Rhea not only drove her to school each day but walked with her to her seat in the classroom. Gradually Diane became used to the bell. But she still had occasional falls on the stairs. When this happened one of her girl friends stood by and escorted her to the nurse's office. Last June, at the picnic of her graduating class, Diane publicly presented the principal with a box of Band-aids. "I used so many of these I thought I should leave a supply for somebody else," she told him, and her classmates laughed at the joke.

The second and third grades were hardest for Diane, for then she encountered the strange cruelty which half-grown children often show toward a handicapped contemporary. Some of her classmates called her "teacher's pet" and "P.C." (for privileged character) because she was excused early for treatments. They smeared mud on her coat and filled the pockets with stones. One small boy on her own block would stand in Diane's way when she was walking on the street, spread out his arms, and force her over in the grass where she was likely to fall.

Rhea met this nasty situation with patience and tact. She went to the parents of the boy who was torturing Diane and asked their co-operation. "Please don't punish or scold him," she said. "Just tell him Diane was hurt when she was a baby, and she will get along much better if he is nice to her." Today this boy and his family are among Diane's best friends.

Since the fourth grade Diane has had little trouble in what the psychologists call "social adjustment." Physical sports are beyond her, but she took part in the annual school plays at Christmastime, and joined the school band as a cornet player. She takes piano lessons, forcing her wavering left hand to come down hard on the bass notes. She is an active Girl Scout, dabbles in painting and ceramics and made her mother a little green pottery turtle as a Christmas present. Best of all, she has acquired the knack of making and keeping friends.

Last September, after much thought, the McDonalds withdrew her from public school and entered her in the Dwight School for girls in nearby Englewood. "Diane is at the age when boys are becoming important," Rhea explains. "Unfortunately, boys of that same age aren't always too considerate. Later on, when Diane is a little older, she should know how to cope with boys better."

This move, Rhea admits, is a deviation from her usual policy of letting Diane take the hard knocks as they come. She frank calls it an experiment. It is too early to s how it is working out.

Because of her father's irregular workin hours, the job of raising and handling Dia has fallen almost entirely to Rhea. Edd McDonald, at fifty-three, is still slim a breezy in manner. He had a serious stoma operation some years back, and has swo off alcohol and tobacco completely. "Now he says, "my only vices are golf and chewi gum." In the warmer months he spen most of his spare hours on the links; in t winter he toils restlessly around the M Donald home at 499 Wyndham Road.

Sometimes he takes Diane fishing at one the North Jersey lakes, or over to New Yo to see a baseball game. About every t weeks he provides tickets for Rhea and Dia to see the show at the Roxy, and afterwa all three of them go around the corner their favorite Chinese restaurant. Rhea is excellent cook and clever "food detective When Eddie runs into a dish he likes at so restaurant, he has her figure out how make it. She has never failed him yet.

At home, the family life is pretty well vided. Rhea and Diane get up together 7:30 and leave for school at 8:10. After dri ing Diane to the door, Rhea does her marke ing on the way home. About three days week she has speaking engagements in co nection with her work for the Bergen Coun Cerebral Palsy League. She has a once- week maid who does most of the laund and heavy house cleaning. She always pic up Diane in the car after school, and s does all her own cooking.

Eddie, who often has to work all nig erecting a new stage set, usually gets around 9 and leaves for the theater betwe 10 and 11. He tries to be home by 6:30, b about one night out of three he can't ma it, so Rhea and Diane have dinner by the selves.

When young George comes home on leav things get livelier, for he and Diane are gre pals. During the time she was growing up h big brother was a strong resource to her; they were caught in the rain on their way church he would pick her up in his arms a carry her across the street. Since he was i ducted into the Army he has been buying h a bond every month from his pay, and Army insurance is made out in her name.

Eddie's pay check at the Roxy is $150 week. Out of this he gives Rhea $95 cash ea week for household and all other family e penses, including gasoline, the maid's $8, a interest on their $3000 mortgage. Rh spends about $40 a week on food and uti ties. Diane's medical expenses have be quite small, because Rhea has done most the work. Her weekly visits to the institu used to cost $3, plus $1 for bridge tolls, wh special examinations were $25. Now Rh spends less than $50 a year for routi checkups, and for occasional doctors' ca when Diane is banged up in a fall.

Eddie's family are Roman Catholics, a both children were baptized in that faith a matter of course. Rhea has never rais any question about this, though she hers has developed an intense and highly in vidual religious faith which is outside a church or creed.

When Diane was confirmed last ye one of the nuns in charge suggested th perhaps she should sit in a chair near t altar while the other children marched do the long church aisle.

"If you think that is best I will not o ject, but I would rather she walked with t others," Rhea told her.

"But what if she falls? Wouldn't she terribly embarrassed?" the nun insiste "At least we should have one of the oth girls hold her arm."

"Sister," asked Rhea gently, "is that the faith you have in God? I will be there church that day praying that He will ho my little girl's arm. Won't you join me in n prayer?"

"Aye, that I will," said the sister hastil and Diane walked safely down the aisle in h white organdy confirmation dress without any help from mortal hands.

One day in 1948 Rhea was listening to the radio when the words "cerebral palsy" caught her attention. The announcer was asking all interested parents to get in touch with Mrs. Henry F. Baer, of River Edge, New Jersey. Before he finished talking Rhea was on the phone calling Mrs. Baer. Soon afterward she and seven other parents met in the Baer home and organized the Bergen County Cerebral Palsy League. Eloise Baer, who had helped start a similar group in Springfield, Massachusetts, was the leading spirit. (Her own daughter has been an honor student and high-school editor, and is now attending college, despite handicaps worse than Diane's.)

Rhea, whose eagerness impressed everybody, was appointed publicity chairman of the league, and has filled that position with zeal ever since. Her main job has been to educate the public as to the real nature of cerebral palsy, and what can be done about it. In particular she has tried to reach parents of afflicted children who were not receiving proper treatment. Even now, sadly enough, too many parents believe such children must be hidden away, or put in an institution.

The Bergen Evening Record and other papers helped Rhea by printing news and feature stories. During the past three years she has spoken and shown films on cerebral palsy to groups of doctors, nurses, teachers, and to innumerable luncheon and women's clubs. She has never had a moment's stage fright as a public speaker. "I went on the stage too young to know what those words meant!" she says.

At a Rotary Club luncheon in Ridgewood one of Rhea's listeners stood up and asked her a number of questions. She couldn't answer them all then and there, but she collected the facts and met with him later. She learned that he was Albert J. Faber, a prominent businessman who was active in fraternal groups and charities. Mr. Faber took a warmhearted interest in the little clinic for cerebral-palsied children which had been started by the Visiting Nurses, Inc., of Bergen County. This clinic was open only on Saturday afternoons, and the mothers had to carry their helpless children, some of them seven and eight years old, up three flights.

"We've got to stop that," said Mr. Faber, "or we'll have two patients for every one."

His first idea, to install an Escalator, proved impractical. "All right," he said. "We'll build our own building. My business is making cement blocks, and I'll give all we need for the framework. I know where we can get a roof and a floor. The new Valley Hospital in Ridgewood ought to give us the land. I'm on the board of trustees there."

The new Bergen County Cerebral Palsy Clinic is, in Rhea's eyes, nothing less than a miracle. Its blueprints were drawn, without charge, by an architect who consulted palsy specialists as far away as Australia. Most of the materials were given free by local business firms. The A.F.L. building-trades unions organized volunteer crews who worked evenings and week ends for nothing. Fathers and mothers labored alongside them, hauling water and mixing cement.

The result is a light, modern, airy building which cost less than $40,000 in cash, but is worth more than $100,000. Its rooms, with rubber-tiled floors and pastel-tinted walls, are fitted with the latest devices for teaching children to walk and talk, and with games which help them control their hands. Its sparkling-clean kitchen serves snacks and orange juice and milk twice a day. One of the parents takes the whole bill for the milk and orange juice.

Children from everywhere are welcome at this clinic, and the charge is purely nominal—$1 for a half hour of treatment. Most of the staff are unpaid volunteers, including the experienced medical director, Dr. George Deaver, of New York. The professional therapists receive their salaries from the New Jersey chapter of the National Society for Crippled Children and Adults, partly through the sale of Easter Seals.

The opening of this clinic, on March 11, 1951, was almost the happiest day of Rhea's life. The happiest? Well, that goes back a few years.

"It was Diane's fourth birthday," says Rhea, "the day she took her first step without my help. That was the happiest day."

THE CAREFUL HEARTS

"How about Fat Flo? How about Earl Who Struck Erl and Got Him a Girl?"

They turned simultaneously, laughing and their looks met and slid away from each other in a careful, pleasant way. Cooney had known other songs, too; an unforgettable melancholy little man he was, slumped at his piano in The Tavern and singing of love in a warm whisper, while hands sought hands and hearts spoke to hearts. All except the hands and hearts of Serena Benton and John Dawson, who were far, far too wise to fall again into the lonely abyss of love. A girl who had been frankly jilted, and a man whose wife hadn't loved him enough to let him live where he could keep that little plot of grass. . . .

They had met uneventfully enough. She came back from lunch that burning May day and saw him, sprawled deep in the chair outside her door, cheek propped on his fist, frowning over a manual. His hair and eyebrows were bleached maple color, he had a brown-leather sheen to his skin, as if he had lived in the sun and the wind a great deal.

"Are you waiting to see me?" Serena asked.

He glanced up, unhurriedly, first at her, then at the name on the door with the words beneath it: Personnel Director. "That you?" he said, rising.

"Yes. For the last three months."

He smiled. "Nice going." He flicked at the book. "No, I'm not waiting to see anybody. I just wanted thirty minutes in a cool place to figure out a problem in mathematics. This seemed to be it."

Oh, Serena thought, he's one of those engineers the Army brought in yesterday to work on Project X. "Well, make yourself at home," she said, and straightway forgot him until that evening at the company clubhouse.

There had been a dinner for some visiting dignitaries from the Coast and now it was over and Serena was crossing the terrace toward the parking lot and her car when she saw him again. He stood against the parapet, smoking idly, his gaze on the twinkling city in the valley a mile below.

"It's quite a sight, isn't it?" she said.

He turned. "Quite," he said, and gestured. "I was trying to pick out a dive down there for myself for the rest of the evening. Do you know of any?"

She grinned. "Dozens."

"Would you care to show me one?" he said. "I'll introduce myself properly."

She considered that. "All right," she said gravely. "My car's over here."

She took him to The Tavern.

There is nothing sumptuous about The Tavern. It is just a low room in the cellar of the best hotel, and the dance floor has a slight buckle. But the pizza is superb and Cooney is there every night at the piano.

Serena and John found a small table. They danced, they ate a pizza. Then Cooney played and sang and the room was silent. When he finished and the dancing began again, arms reached hungrily for each other as if his music had awakened old and forgotten needs.

Serena, watching, thought, Once I felt like that, too, and sensed John Dawson's eyes on her.

"Where were you," he asked impersonally, "when the passion was floating all around us?"

She should have been startled, but she was not even surprised. "Oh, in my den in the rocks," she said. "It's really quite a nice place. The temperature is always the same, and you don't hear a thing or see a thing or ——" Or feel a thing, she almost said.

"I'm an old den dweller myself," John said. "Shall we compare notes?"

Serena stared at him. She thought, Why, he too! That's why he knew about me! "Yes," she said, "let's," and heard, then, her own voice telling him, while the people and the room and the music blurred away, about that fabulous winter-into-spring of last year.

Although she had been only twenty-five, she'd already made a name for herself at the branch office in her home town for her skill at handling people. Everybody knew that an important post in Personnel was open to her at the main plant any time she cared to make the change; everybody could guess, easily enough, why she was not interested.

Jeremy Harris had come to town just before Christmas to serve an apprenticeship in the law office of Judge Abel, who had gone to school with Jeremy's father. He and Serena met at a holiday party, and before the week was out they were in love.

They made a brilliant pair, Jeremy with his golden head and white smile and quick laughter, Serena dark and cool and lovely. It was good to see them together, with Serena's eyes clinging to Jeremy's face as if she were reading in it some strange and beautiful story which she must commit to memory. The town, which had known all about Serena all her life, said pleasedly, "It's come at last for her." And every night Serena said into her pillow, Jeremy, oh Jeremy, how glad I am I waited for you to come!

Fantastically, the day which was to be her most anguished began as the happiest of all, a Saturday morning when Jeremy called to ask her if she would drive out into the country with him that afternoon.

It was April. They drove through the miles of new-plowed fields and greening hillsides. Jeremy was very still, so still that Serena knew he had something on his mind.

He stopped the car where an old wagon road led down to a creek, swirling around a sitting rock. They walked down to the creek. What a lovely, lovely place for a proposal, Serena thought. She waited with butterflies fluttering around her heart.

"Serena," said Jeremy, and stopped.

She turned to him. "Yes?"

"I'm going to Cuba next week."

She heard the words, but they did not register.

"There's a vacancy in a firm in Havana. It doesn't mean very much in the way of money, but"—excitement slipped through his carefully tight voice—"but it's a chance at something better than living in the sticks, the way I always have—the way I always will if I don't get away from here."

It registered now. But because she was a woman and in love, she said, "I think it's marvelous, Jeremy."

"It'll be better than staying here, anyway," he said. "I don't know how I've stood this place as long as I have. I couldn't have, if it hadn't been for you, Serena. You're responsible for the only good times I've had here! Don't ever think I'm not grateful to you for them."

She wondered how, with her heart broken, she could find words, but she found them. "They were good times for me, too, Jeremy."

The relief in his face was almost ludicrous. He must have been afraid of tears, reproaches, pleadings. His eyes went over her in their old, brilliant way; he pointed both barrels of his charm at her. "Serena, it's all been beautiful, as beautiful as this place. Let's remember it this way."

She felt sick. "I will remember it," she said, and walked back up the path to the car.

The next week she did the wise thing. She took the proffered job at the main plant, two hundred miles away. There her life went on, outwardly normal; she was Serena Benton, the pretty new girl in Personnel who laughed hard and worked hard and was something of a diplomat. And nobody guessed that the true Serena Benton had crawled into a den one April day and never come out again.

Nobody, until a tall man by the name of John Dawson came along, with quiet speculation in his eyes. He sat now, opposite her in The Tavern, building a house of matches. Her voice stopped.

"Still in love with him?" John said.

"No," Serena said. "Are you—with her?"

He quirked his brows. "Not me! I had a bad attack, but I made a beautifully complete recovery. We both lived in Idaho. I came home from college, got the engineering job I wanted, went courting. I had in mind a place just outside of town with a grass plot. I didn't care so much about the house, but I wanted the grass. I used to think about it a lot when I was over in the Pacific during the war. I kept seeing it, green the way nothing else is green. There's something everlasting about grass; owning a piece of it makes you feel that even if the rest of the world goes to smash, you've still got your little bit of forever to hold on to. She wanted that grass plot, too—until after we were married. Then I found that she had never wanted anything except a swank apartment in a big town and the kind of life that went with it. It's two years since we were divorced and she's remarried, but"—he smiled—"grass still doesn't look like grass to me. It looks like green concrete."

We're kin, Serena thought, lonely kin.

That was the beginning. Two days later he called her at the office. "This is John Dawson. Would you like to go out amongst them tonight?"

She found herself smiling at the mouthpiece. "I think it would be lovely," she told him.

"Good. Will you tell me where you live? I'll be there by eight-thirty."

They took her car and went to a late movie and stopped in at The Tavern. Then Serena drove him to his boardinghouse, and before he opened the car door she said, "I

Sleep, my Babe; oh, be not affrighted,
'T is but the ox stamps foot in the stall.
He is a dumb beast, but Thy bed he provided,
And sweet-smelling hay to soften withal.

Sleep, my Babe; weep not at the bleating
Of yon little lamb that cries by the wall.
His fine coat of wool, when the time comes for fleecing,
Shall cover Thee warmly, my Jesu, so small.

Sleep, my Babe; nor fear the cock's crowing.
He shrilly proclaimeth a new day begun.
Lo, how the lilies in fair fields are growing,
Lifting their heads to the slow-rising sun!

Sleep, my Babe; my own little Jesu.
Peace to the ox that shareth his stall;
Peace to the cock, the lamb and the lily;
Glory to God Who maketh us all!

feel as if I've known you all my life, John. It's a good feeling."

"That's because you don't have to be on emotional guard with me. We've both been through the same wringer." He patted her hand. "Good night."

That was the way of all their dates, each one uncomplicatedly complete in itself. There was no effort in whatever they did; just a contented and haphazard charm. If they decided to go to a movie, they were likely to drive right on by the theater and end up at a square dance in the country. If they decided to go to a neighboring town to dine in state, they might be tempted to take a strange road and stop at some roadside stand for hamburgers and root beer. On hot nights they went swimming in the river, scorning the pool as being for sissies. Sometimes on Saturdays Serena would pack a lunch basket and they would eat high on a mountain, where the cool winds came with darkness to ease the sting of sun.

At least twice a week they went to The Tavern. One night while Cooney sang about yearning, a sudden impatience woke in Serena and she said, "This is really no place for us, you know."

"Why?"

"The people who come here are searching for something that we've already had. Look at them; they're drowning."

John gave the room a careful survey. "So," he said, and turned back to her, his eyes laughing. "We can't have Cooney helping all these innocents go wrong, can we? Excuse me."

He strolled across the room and bent over Cooney, and in a minute the skylarking nonsense of Fat Flo bounced into the air. John returned.

"Better?" he said pleasantly.

"Much."

But it wasn't, somehow. An old serenity was gone from the room. As if the door of her den had blown open, leaving her shivering and vulnerable at last. She glanced at John. He was, characteristically, nodding his head in beat to the music, a little smile on his mouth.

She got up. "I have an early meeting tomorrow," she said.

He rose, too, immediately attentive. "I'm sorry. I wasn't even noticing the time."

Later, in the dulled blackness of her bedroom, she pressed a hand to her eyes to keep back the angry tears. What had possessed her to talk about those lovesick people at The Tavern? Let them love. She and John were immune, weren't they? And why was she crying, for heaven's sake? Was it because, staring at the night outside her window, she knew that never again would her evenings at The Tavern be wholly tranquil? They never were.

HER mother's birthday coincided with John's last week end. Serena told him ruefully about it over lunch on Friday. "I'll have to go," she said. "I've never yet missed one of her birthdays."

"Fine thing to do," John grumbled, "run out on me the last two days I'll be here! Guess I'll have to go home with you."

She stared. "You mean you'd like to?"

"What time do we start?" he said.

She laughed, and heads turned at the luminous sound of it. "At six tonight," she told him.

John paid the check and they walked out to the dazzling white heat of midday, close together, hands coupled, as always. Just as they were about to cross the street, furiously blowing horns sounded and a chain of cars came speeding toward them. A wedding, Serena thought, and shaded her eyes. In the back seat of the front car sat the bride and groom, young, lost in each other, radiant. Serena and John waved.

"So people do really still get married?" Serena said, more to herself than to John.

"They do if they don't know any better," he said.

Sudden pain frightened Serena. "I suppose that's the answer," she said through numb lips.

"Of course it is! Why should sensible people live in a harness when they can have their freedom, like you and me?"

The pain was white-hot as they walked across the street to her office. There, suddenly, she wanted to hurt him, to shake that hard, imperturbable philosophy of his.

"I'll pick you up at six," she said, looking at him. "That is, if you still think you want to come. I'm not sure you ought to. We have lots of grass there. It might bring back memories."

He was silent a moment, his eyes searching her face. Then he said gravely, "Perhaps you're right. We wouldn't want me hurt again, would we?" He held out his hand. "Good-by, Serena. Wish your mother a happy birthday for me."

You asked for it, my friend, Serena told herself. "On the other hand," she said lightly, "I think you'd like my home town. See you at six." She walked up the steps of the building.

SHE was repentant all afternoon. What had come over her? She had sounded like a shrew. John was her good, her very good friend, and in two days he would be gone forever. I'll make it up to him over the week end, she thought.

She studied his face as he came around the car at six o'clock and got into the driver's seat. He looked at her fondly.

"Hello, dear. All set?"

She slid close to him, drawing a long breath. "All set."

Time found swift wings. They reached her home a little before midnight. Surprise was in her parents' eyes when John followed her into the house, but they said nothing then or afterward, blessedly; they just admitted him to their hospitality as a friend of Serena's. And they liked him. Serena, keenly watchful for signs of that, had seen them surely before she had been at home half an hour.

A soft answer turneth away wrath: but grievous words stir up anger. —PROVERBS 15:1.

Saturday morning was gone almost before it began. In the hot sweetness of late afternoon, Serena took John on a walking tour of town, and everywhere they went they met people who knew her, people with warm greetings on their lips and sly inquiry in their eyes.

Serena laughed softly. "They think you're my new beau," she said.

"Oh? Well, let's give them something substantial to go on, then." And John put his arm around her, and kept it there while they strolled back to the house.

But that evening the pain came back to Serena, and she was not to be free of it again. Friends kept dropping in with gifts for her mother and stayed on, filling the house with laughter.

Serena left John towering courteously over two old ladies in the living room and met her mother in the hall.

"Look on the kitchen table and see what John sent me," Mrs. Benton said. Her eyes were bright. "I'm going to bring them in when I cut the cake."

Serena pushed open the swinging doors. On the table was a big green crystal basket, filled with white roses. A card dangled from the handle. It said, "These look like you, John."

Serena's heart burned. Half of her mind said, Why did he have to do a human thing like this, the day before he leaves? Den dwellers aren't supposed to step out of character. And the other half said, Why shouldn't he? After all, they're only flowers.

But the callous thought could not armor her against the pain. It went back into the living room with her and stayed till the last guest had gone. It climbed the stairs with her; stayed in her heart while she stared at shadows on the ceiling, followed her into sleep. It woke when she woke, it hid beneath her smiles when she said good-by to her parents, and it rode in her all the long way back to the city.

The pain was still with her as the two hundred miles dwindled to ten and to five and to three.

"How long will you be in Chicago?" she asked.

"Probably no more than a week. Just long enough to get the hang of this new job on the Coast."

"And then—flit again," Serena said.

"Flit again," John agreed.

The rain drummed on the car roof. In the distance was a black hull, climbing the night. "Where do you think you'll finally settle?" Serena asked.

"I don't know." He twisted his head sideways. "Couple of deer running through that field. See 'em?"

"Yes." She laughed. "Remember the time I was picking flowers and that deer jumped out ahead of me?"

John laughed, too, gently. "I never saw anybody so scared."

The black hull took form. The airport. Oh, no, Serena thought, not yet. And suddenly, in this last, lost, too-late moment she found out what had been happening to her. The pain found a new intensity, exquisitely cruel.

"Well, this trip didn't take long," John said.

"No," Serena said.

Her hands were shaking on the wheel. She should have known, all these days, weeks. The pain had been only the slow resurrection of emotions that she had thought were dead forever. When John left her tonight she would not be able to creep back into her den in the rocks. Never any more. That Serena Benton had vanished. From now on a love song, the sight of a couple walking hand in hand, would be a knife in her heart.

She turned into the drive and stopped in the orange light streaming from the waiting room. John came around and opened her door.

"I'll wait for you at the gate," she said, and turned the corner of the building and stood by the confining fence.

The plane squatted on the cement runway like a huge glimmering bug. An attendant went by with John's luggage on a carrier. Serena's fists were jammed deep in the pockets of her raincoat.

"Good-by, John," she whispered, shivering.

A door opened behind her. John's voice said, "Everybody's on board but me. We take off in two minutes." His eyes were moving slowly over her face. Don't let him see anything, she prayed. "Well, good-by," he said.

She searched mindlessly for a scrap of their old jargon. "Good-by," she said. "Have fun always."

The attendant came back with the empty luggage carrier. "You'd better hurry, sir," he said.

"Yes," Serena said, "you'd better," and pushed him.

He was a tall figure on the rain-swept runway. Halfway across, he turned and waved. Serena waved back.

"John, John, I love you," she said, and walked blindly toward her car.

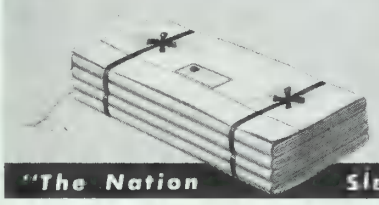
She heard the plane taxi down the strip and thought, I'll have to do something with my life. Work until I drop and then work some more and never, never again look at any man with maple-sugar hair and a Huckleberry Finn smile. She bit her lips, fighting tears, while the cold crept through her.

"Serena," John said.

I'm dreaming, she thought, and marveled that she could turn around on knees as rubbery as hers.

"I was climbing into the plane when I decided to take one last look at you," John said. "Then the queerest thing happened. It seemed as though that whole strip of concrete turned into grass, and you were standing in the middle of it. They took off without me."

It had come to him, too, her dazed mind said. He was trying to tell her —— Rain fell on her uplifted face, her mouth. "I love grass," she whispered.



His arms reached out and her hands lifted to touch his face and there was no longer anything impersonal or heedful or guarded about either of them. THE END

A feast for the festive—ham-and-chicken gumbo, curried shrimp and scallops, tomato aspic. Top with vanilla-cherry pudding.

By Ruth Mills Teague

AT this time of year we accumulate social obligations with surprising speed, and instead of attempting a series of small dinner parties, why not concentrate on one big open house where all your friends are invited? It's in the gay spirit of holiday hospitality and it's very practical from the standpoint of the work involved—you can prepare a buffet party for twenty almost as easily as a sit-down dinner party for six or eight. In planning the menu, we have provided for "drop-in" and "stay-on" guests, ideas that can be adopted in whole or in part—but every recipe a holiday specialty!

For the people who will drop in for a short time and not stay for dinner, we recommend nibble food, both cold and hot. The cold hors d'oeuvres will be ripe and stuffed olives and halves of English walnuts stuck together with a Roquefort-cheese mixture. Olives are always (Continued on Page 164)

you need DIAMOND WALNUTS

Watch your family and friends reach for cookies studded with Diamond Walnuts. They know what's best—and they can't resist the goodness of golden walnut kernels. As proof, here are 3 different recipes—each one a winner, thanks to crisp, sweet Diamond Walnuts!

WALNUT SURPRISE SQUARES

Stir together 1 egg, 1 cup brown sugar, firmly packed, and 1 tsp. vanilla. Add ½ cup sifted flour mixed with ¼ tsp. each salt and soda. Add 1 cup coarsely chopped Diamond Walnuts – keep the pieces fairly big; their crispness contrasts so temptingly with the chewy texture of this cooky. Spread in buttered 8-in. square pan. Bake in moderate oven (350°) 18 to 20 min. (Cookies should be soft when taken from oven.) Leave in pan; cut in squares as needed.

Shell a pound of Diamond Walnuts and measure what you get. With the 2 full cups of kernels they give, you'll have enough for 4 favorite walnut recipes! Diamond Walnuts always give you more fresh, usable kernels per pound!

DIAMOND WALNUT CLUSTERS

¼ cup soft butter or margarine
½ cup sugar
1 egg
1 ¼ tsps. vanilla
1 ½ sqs. unsweetened chocolate, melted
½ cup sifted flour
¼ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
2 cups coarsely broken Diamond Walnuts

Cream butter or margarine and sugar till fluffy. Add egg and vanilla; beat well. Stir in melted chocolate, then flour sifted with baking powder and salt. Now add walnuts—Diamonds, definitely, for the rich flavor and crisp crunchiness that makes these cookies! Drop by teaspoonfuls on greased baking sheet. Bake in moderate oven (350°) 10 min., not longer (they should be soft when taken from oven). Cool on rack. Makes 30.

Prize of your kitchen cupboard — Diamond vacuum-packed shelled Walnuts! In 8- or 4-oz. cans, they're always fresh and sweet — ready for instant use!

WALNUT-ORANGE CRISPS

Start with any favorite refrigerator cooky recipe. Add a tablespoon of grated orange peel and two tablespoons of orange juice – plus plenty of finely chopped Diamond Walnuts. (No refrigerator cooky is really complete without Diamond Walnuts.) What a delicious new flavor!

Careful shoppers look for the Diamond brand on walnuts, to get full value for their money. Buy Diamond Walnuts in bulk or in 1 lb. cellophane bags (red for large size, blue for medium).

popular, and nuts prepared this way are truly a gourmet item. For the hot hors d'oeuvres we'll have tuna-and-chutney canapés and curried shrimp and scallops. The shrimp and scallops will do double duty because they will also be part of the main meal, but they make a delicious hot hors d'oeuvre spread on buttered toast points.

The main hot dish for the stay-ons will be ham-and-chicken gumbo, baked in a casserole. This will be a recipe to keep in your files because it's so extra good and perfect for a buffet party, summer or winter. There must be a big salad, of course, and I think you'll like the one I'm going to suggest: a mold of tomato aspic and cream cheese done in layers and surrounded by lettuce cups filled with marinated peas, carrots and celery. The tomato aspic is highly seasoned and combines wonderfully with the bland cream-cheese mixture. Herb-butter sandwiches will add the final touch to the main course.

There should be a Christmasy dessert, and I've chosen vanilla-cherry icebox pudding. It's easy to make, requires no cooking and, most important, it's very good to eat.

With these recipes you will be safe if about twenty people stay on through dinner. There may be a serious raid on the curried shrimp and scallops in the early part of the evening, but that needn't worry you. If everyone has eaten a lot of that before dinner they'll be more interested in the other dishes during dinner. I suggest that you telephone your invitations so that you will have a definite check on those who are just dropping in for a while and those who are staying on.

HOT TUNA-AND-CHUTNEY CANAPÉS

Make enough piecrust for 3 regular-sized pie shells. Roll to about $\frac{1}{8}$" thickness and cut into $2\frac{1}{2}$" squares. Flake 1 seven-ounce can tuna fish with a fork, add $\frac{3}{4}$ cup chutney cut into small pieces, 4 tablespoons finely chopped green pepper, 4 tablespoons finely chopped onion and $\frac{2}{3}$ cup mayonnaise. Put 1 teaspoon of mixture in center of a piecrust square and bring all points of dough to center. Pinch the seams carefully to seal them, then dip your fingers into beaten egg and pinch seams again. Brush top with beaten egg and transfer to cooky sheet. Bake in preheated hot—500° F.—oven until delicately browned—about 10 minutes. But watch it—most ovens have tricks all their own. This recipe will make approximately 75 canapés.

ENGLISH WALNUTS WITH ROQUEFORT CHEESE

I'm not going to specify quantity here. You can go as far as you like with a strong assurance that every last one will be gobbled up. Cream until smooth half-and-half Roquefort cheese and cream cheese. Add a few drops lemon juice and a tiny bit of sweet or sour cream to moisten the mixture just a little. Put in refrigerator to harden. In some stores you can buy perfect halves of English walnuts, but you may have to crack the nuts yourself. If you do this you'll probably have some duds—at least I always do—but the ones that aren't perfect can be saved for the icebox pudding. When cheese has hardened, work it into balls about the size of a small marble. Put a ball on the inner surface of a nut half and press the other half against it until there's a line of white where they join. Keep in a cold place until ready to serve.

CURRIED SHRIMP AND SCALLOPS

You will need $3\frac{1}{2}$ cups raw scallops, fresh or frozen, and 4 cups precooked shrimp. Three 10-ounce boxes of frozen scallops make $3\frac{1}{2}$ cups. Cut scallops into smallish pieces. Get small shrimp or cut large ones into chunks. Melt some butter or margarine in a skillet, add scallops and 2 or 3 cloves garlic, finely minced, and cook 5 minutes, stirring often. Melt $\frac{1}{4}$ pound butter or margarine in a large saucepan and stir in $\frac{3}{4}$ cup flour. In a measuring cup stir 2 tablespoons curry powder with 2 tablespoons vinegar, fill cup with milk and put this and $4\frac{1}{2}$ more cups of whole milk in saucepan. If you like, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sherry may be substituted for $\frac{1}{2}$ cup whole milk. Add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon ginger, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon nutmeg, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon cayenne pepper, 3 envelopes chicken-bouillon powder or 3 bouillon cubes and 2 teaspoons salt. Cook, stirring constantly, until sauce has boiled 1 minute and add shrimp, scallops and liquid that will have cooked out of them, and 5 tablespoons chopped parsley. Now taste and add more of any seasoning you feel is needed. The curry taste should be fairly strong and the garlic taste faint but definitely there. Make the day before and reheat.

HAM-AND-CHICKEN GUMBO

The gumbo can be prepared in a casserole for baking a day in advance and baked the day of the party. It doesn't require watching. The main ingredients are 1 large stewing chicken, $1\frac{1}{2}$ pounds smoked ham, $\frac{1}{3}$ pound bacon, 2 No. 2 cans tomatoes, 2 No. 2 cans cut okra, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups chopped onion and 2 cups uncooked rice. Two days in advance, put chicken in kettle with 4 cups water and 2 teaspoons salt. Bring to a boil, lower heat and cook until tender—about $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours—or pressure cook at 15 pounds for 22 minutes. Take chicken from bones, cut breast into thin slices and cut the rest into bite-size chunks. Put bones back in broth and cook half an hour or so to make broth richer. Strain, cool and store in cold place. The same day, wash 2 cups long-grained rice through 6 waters, strain in colander and let stand overnight to dry. If rice is wet, the grains stick together and it's difficult to distribute them evenly over the layers.

Now we're ready to fill the casserole. Strain okra; put tomatoes in a bowl, chop into small pieces and add 2 large cloves garlic, finely minced; cut ham into bite-size pieces; cut bacon into slivers and chop onion to make $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups. Use a 4-quart casserole. This will be a four-layer proposition, so you'll use approximately one fourth of each ingredient for each layer, but save some okra and tomato for the top to make it look pretty. The sequence will be rice, bacon, tomato, chicken, okra, onion and ham. Sprinkle each tomato layer with freshly ground black pepper, but don't use any salt. The ham, bacon and chicken broth will provide enough salt. When finished, the casserole should be filled to about $\frac{3}{4}$" from top. Remove congealed fat from chicken broth and pour 3 cups broth into casserole and cover.

The gumbo will require about 2 hours' baking in a hot—425° F.—oven. When cooking time is almost up, remove cover, taste to see if rice is tender and add a little more broth if needed. The consistency shouldn't be at all runny, but it should be moist. Keep hot on a heating device or in a barely turned on oven.

TOMATO RIBBON ASPIC

Use a transparent loaf-shape mold with capacity of 7 cups.

Tomato Aspic. In a kettle put 4 cups tomato juice, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup vinegar, grated rind of 1 lemon, juice of $\frac{1}{2}$ lemon, 2 cloves garlic cut into chunks, 1 teaspoon dried red pepper (pepperoni), 6 whole cloves, 1 teaspoon salt, 2 tablespoons and 1 teaspoon sugar, and 1 bay leaf. Boil, uncovered, 5 minutes and strain. Add 4 envelopes unflavored gelatin that has been softened 5 minutes in $\frac{3}{4}$ cup cold tomato juice and stir until gelatin is dissolved. Set in cold water.

Cream-Cheese Filling. Cream 12 ounces cream cheese until soft, add 1 cup sour cream and blend thoroughly. Soften $1\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoons unflavored gelatin in $\frac{1}{4}$ cup cold water for 5 minutes, place container in pan of boiling water and dissolve. Add gelatin to cream-cheese mixture and blend. Bring a pan of water to boiling point, turn heat as low as possible and set bowl of cheese over—not in—it, to keep mixture soft.

Rub mold with salad oil, and when tomato aspic has thickened slightly but is still runny, put 1¾ cups aspic in mold. Set in freezing compartment of refrigerator to hasten hardening. When aspic is firm enough not to run but still tacky to the touch, put in half the cream-cheese mixture and smooth to an even layer. Return mold to freezing compartment and when cheese layer is fairly firm, add another 1¾ cups tomato aspic. When this layer is firm, add the remainder of the cheese, and when it is firm, add the rest of the aspic, and that's it. When last layer is in, put mold in refrigerator, but not in freezing compartment. (For peace of mind when unmolding time comes, I like to line the sides and bottom of mold with a strip of cellophane long enough to extend over the sides. The ends can be loosened by holding a cloth wrung out of hot water against them. You can tell when they are loose enough for unmolding by grasping two ends of the cellophane and lifting a little.)

Cook, in separate kettles, peas and thin rounds of carrot. Drain, mix together and add French dressing. Chop some celery very fine, cover with ice cubes and store in refrigerator. All this is day-before business.

To serve, unmold aspic in center of platter and mix drained celery with peas and carrots. Arrange cup-shaped lettuce leaves around aspic, fill them with marinated vegetables and serve a bowl of mayonnaise with the salad. Don't slice the aspic too thin. Cut it in slices about ¾" thick and then cut each slice in half.

HERB-BUTTER SANDWICHES

Herb butter can be used in many ways. It is delicious on broiled meats or fish—spread on after, not during, broiling; it gives a marvelous flavor to vegetables; and it makes super sandwiches. The proportions are ¼ pound sweet butter to 1 teaspoon dried herbs or 2 tablespoons finely chopped fresh herbs. The herbs can be any one or a combination of two of the fine herbs, which are sweet basil, chervil, sweet marjoram, garden thyme, rosemary and tarragon. I've chosen sweet basil and marjoram for this herb butter, but if you have special pets, suit yourself.

Take 1 tablespoon sweet butter from ¼ pound and let it get quite warm but not boiling. Add ½ teaspoon dried sweet basil and ½ teaspoon dried marjoram, stir well and let stand while you cream the remainder of the ¼ pound butter with a few drops lemon juice. Add herbs and melted butter, blend and store in refrigerator in an air-tight jar. Just before spreading sandwiches, add a little salt and 2 tablespoons finely chopped chives. The herb butter should be prepared at least a day in advance of use.

VANILLA-CHERRY ICEBOX PUDDING

Cream ½ pound butter or margarine with 1¾ cups confectioners' sugar. Add 7 well-beaten egg yolks and 4 teaspoons vanilla and beat with rotary beater until blended. Soften 1 envelope unflavored gelatin in ¼ cup water, add ½ cup milk, or if you prefer, ½ cup port. Set container in boiling water until gelatin is dissolved and add to butter, egg yolks and sugar. Fold in 7 egg whites, beaten until stiff, and 1 cup heavy cream, beaten until stiff, and add 1 cup nut meats and 1 cup maraschino cherries, both coarsely chopped.

Grease sides of a 10" cake pan with a removable rim and line sides with unsplit ladyfingers. If they don't want to stand up straight, spread a little softened butter or margarine on the ladyfingers and press them against the pan. If the ladyfingers are average size, you'll need about 22, and be sure they are as close together as possible. Spoon in half the pudding mixture and make a flat layer of ladyfinger halves on top of this. Add the remaining pudding.

You can decorate it now or after it is set, and you can be as fancy as you like. I think the simple decoration I have used—just the rim of cherries, with green pistachios, sprinkled all over the top—is quite effective, but all sorts of pretty nonsense could be done with whipped cream and a pastry tube and it would be still more festive.

When you are ready to unmold the pudding—this can be at any convenient time, so long as it is kept cold—run a spatula down the side behind each ladyfinger, release spring and remove ring. Transfer pudding, still on bottom of pan, to the serving platter.

Service. Except for sticking the gumbo in the oven, spreading the herb-butter sandwiches and making the toast points, all the work involved in preparing this meal will be done in advance. I don't say the work is little—this is quite a production if you include everything—but if spread over several days it can be a lot of fun, if you like to cook. If you don't feel the need to combine two parties in one, which this menu literally does, confine it to a "before" dinner or just dinner and reduce the menu accordingly.

Preparing the food won't be a problem, but serving it may be, unless a careful plan of action is worked out and followed through. Before any guests arrive your buffet can be set up with plates, silver, napkins, and so on, and the food can be arranged on serving dishes ready to be brought in. For an open house, people aren't apt to arrive en masse as for a dinner party, so I'd wait until a few are there before bringing in the hors d'oeuvres. The tuna-chutney canapés, curried sea food and toast points and the relishes can be placed on one table in the living room or on various tables, and a stack of small plates should be available. This will have to be a serve-yourself affair because you'll be too busy greeting guests to do much passing. The canapés and sea food should definitely rest on some kind of heating device, but in this day of gadgets that shouldn't be difficult to accomplish. When the dinner hour arrives—and with this food the time can be elastic—it will take only a few minutes to arrange serving dishes on the buffet. People can drift happily from living room to dining room, or wherever the buffet is set up—and I hope you'll be the happiest drifter of all. Merry Christmas! Happy New Year!

I WAS A PRINCESS

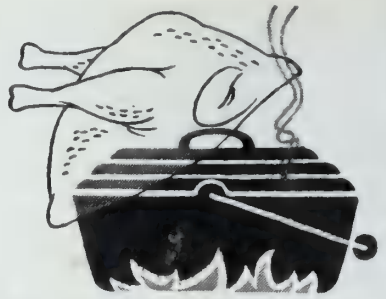
work! What a life of leisure that must be."

It was some such feeling, doubtless, that made one of my recent American acquaintances say to me, "But how good it must feel to you—to know that you are at last leading a really useful life."



It is difficult to think of words positive enough to explain how wrong such a viewpoint is in my case! I was born, to the sound of the twenty-one-gun royal salute, to the daughter of a long line of kings and emperors; therefore it is true that I started life in one sense from above—from the top, you would say. But the twenty-one-gun salute meant also that I was born into an occupation already established for me. "Duty" was the key word of my childhood and youth. I was trained to do my duty to my country in all things, to be respectful and loving to my parents, loyal to family and friends. "Princes are born in public and die in public"—and between those two occasions they live in public. It is only now, when I have lived in other countries, that I can look at all objectively at my training; that I can see how anyone might think it odd that I would feel I must attend a scheduled state banquet on one special evening when, as a young girl, I thought my heart was broken, or that I would drive across the city of Ploesti during a bombing raid to keep an appointment at an important school function where I had promised to preside. These things were duties, but housekeeping was not included in those duties. It would have been egotism on my part to take the time that belonged to the country in order to learn to do things which were already being done efficiently and well by others. Royalty has always gotten into difficulties when it insisted on leaving its prescribed duties for something it chose to do for its own pleasure!

It is true that I had some leisure time—not much, but a little—which I could spend as I liked. My older sisters had toyed with cooking. I smile when I think of the paraphernalia brought up to their rooms upon silver trays carried by liveried footmen: the spirit lamp, the dishes, spoons and utensils; the collection of ingredients properly washed and prepared. But it was only a game, and one that did not happen to interest me. I spent my own leisure in other occupations: learning something about painting and sculpturing, and beginning those activities which led later to my serious training in nursing. Even after my marriage, when I found it difficult to cope with the cook and servants of a strange country, my duty seemed to lie with my children and with my infirmary, which served the neighboring villages. I solved my housekeeping problem then by bringing in Romanian servants to help me—and that is why, in spite of a disciplined and busy life, I could stand in my shining Massachusetts kitchen, utterly ignorant of cooking. Fate had brought me into a new situation. "Duty" had completely changed its face. Lunch for six hungry children had to be served.

PERHAPS because as a child I always had a governess near me to remind me of my duty if I forgot it, I have the habit of talking to myself—of encouraging or reproving myself in what I am doing.

"Well, Ileana, my girl," I said to myself, "what now? Let's see what you can do! There was a time when you might not have believed you could face bombardment—but you learned! When you first studied nursing it would have seemed incredible that one day you would desperately but quite calmly operate on patients in need—but you did. And the patients lived too! Come! Surely you are not stumped by a kitchen stove!"

A kind friend had left me ingredients. I had an old cookbook, and I made a stew and it was good. The family approved. Thus I embarked upon my career as a cook. Old memories of appetizing dishes served from my mother's kitchen came to my mind. By dint of thought and other recipes, these slowly took shape. At first I was overhelmed by all I had to do. Fatigue took ossession of my body and my mind. A hun-ed times I ran up and down stairs. I made ie wrong gestures, I burned my hands and ms.

This sounds as if no one had wished to lp me, but many did. The kindness that as shown me, the presents I received to art with, were heartening indeed. But I felt had to stand on my own and learn the hard ay, for the hard way is the only way. I ow from bitter experience where it leads , to lean on others. It is only when one has arned to stand on one's own feet, when one s found a solid foundation, that it is wise good to accept help. So I declined much the kind assistance offered me, deter-ined to make a home for my children by yself with my own efforts. I learned the ays of the white stove, and then I dared to ckle the automatic laundry machine and e electric mangle.

Yes, I have spent a lot on this kitchen. It ay perhaps surprise you to find such com-ete equipment in a house for which I had first had no other furniture outside the chen except seven beds and seven chairs. nd—which seems to amuse some of my w friends—a large Oriental rug which was wedding gift to my other from her uncle, ar Alexander III.) it in making my new e I meant to have e best tools from the rt, and to wait pa-ntly until I could other things less ential. They o with unaccustomed hands used strange s to conquer a new land would under-nd my white and shining kitchen! I feel y close to the spirits of these ancestors of rs, who also learned to live again, as I e upon this cheerful, practical room. Soon all gather up and wash the dishes of my al meal and go to that other room to ch I have invited you.

here, too, I feel close in spirit to your estors—those who brought across an un-wn ocean a cherished bit of china, a piece ilver, a family miniature—for there I e gathered a few precious belongings m my other life. Come and look at it with for the bedroom with its white walls is castle, and it is also the whole story of life.

ER my bed hangs a beautiful Spanish ifix my mother left me in her will. It had ained in Sonnberg, my home in Austria. Russian soldier during the occupation w it out the window; a peasant child nd and hid it for me, and finally it came k to me.

ere I have also the icon my mother given at the time of my youngest her's death. She carried it always with and since her death it has never left -although only through the unexpected pathy of one of my communist guards I finally permitted to take it with me n I left Romania.

In this room I draw the curtains, which are yellow with large blue-brown designs. How strange to look out between them on twilight in an American town! They come from the very first house I ever arranged—a hunting lodge in faraway Moldavia which was left me twenty-four years ago by my father. How it shocked the old caretaker to have the heavy plush draperies replaced with such bright ones! The little rug on my floor is an old Chinese one—a soft, perfect blue—which used to lie on the floor of my mother's room in the castle at Bran. From the wall, looking down on her rug, is a water color of tulips painted by my mother, who loved flowers; and there is also a wonderful print of the sea. This is both old and new. I once had the same picture, and found a print of it here in the house of one whom today I call friend, and who gave it to me; and thus it is a tie with what was and what is.

GUARDIAN of my days and nights stands a carved statue of St. Benedict, bent in reverent and dignified prayer. Once he stood in a blue-tiled room in the castle at Sinaia beside a marble fountain gushing mountain waters. The windows behind him looked out upon the Carpathians. As a little girl, after bidding my parents good night I always paid a visit to St. Benedict, whose perfect, impassive face fascinated me. Did he know that the child who with awe-filled love kissed him good night would one day wrap him in window draperies and desperately win permission from the Russian invaders to take him across an ocean, to a strange continent? So he came here with me, and is as a living presence in my room.

On the mantelpiece are a few beautiful jades—hidden from the Russians in a chimney in Austria for four years. Beside them is a round, flat, gilded box. This holds my greatest treasure—a handful of Romanian soil brought over the Romanian frontier past Romanian guards who had betrayed their country, and who turned away and could not face me when I showed them what the little box contained.

Around me tonight there is peace, content: so much to look back on, so much to be grateful for, so much to look forward to. I am not, then, lonely, even though I am alone in this house I have invited you to visit. Besides, tomorrow the children come back from school. There will be happy cries, rushing and stamping up and down stairs, radio and phonograph going, questions and demands, arms entwined around my neck, laughter—and probably a little scolding. It will be home and a happy family life. And there are friends old and new within reach. I can call them if I choose, or they may call me.

But tonight I'd rather be still and pause a moment, before I look forward to the future or backward to the past. Like Brother Lawrence, "I have need to busy my heart with quietude."

There is one thing I cannot show you, one very important thing which I was allowed to bring with me from my old life, and which made the foundation of my new one. You can see it in a photograph of my mother there on the table [a photograph of Princess Ileana wearing this tiara appears on Page 44—ED.], but no picture can give you any idea of the living glow and the rainbow fires in the sapphire-and-diamond tiara she is wearing.

"A tiara!" you say. "Now that is what one expects of a princess!"

Yes, I can agree with you. This was truly a royal diadem. Nicholas I of Russia had it

BEST MAN

Ever since the tribe of Benjamin started the fashion, men have literally taken their brides. When it was impossible to gain the consent of a parent to the marriage of a likely girl, a young warrior might stage a raid. He and a friend would kidnap the girl, who of course had previously informed her lover as to the most likely time and place for the deed. When the father and outraged family followed, it was the best man who stood in the breach while the young bridegroom-to-be made his escape. Many things such as shoes, stones, clubs and a variety of worthless but handy missiles were hurled. Now and then both girl and family consented to the marriage. To appease the vanity of women, fake battles were staged. The tin can on the car and the throwing of old shoes are the modern civilized version of this popular pastime of a bygone age.

Cranberry Christmas Dessert

Basic Recipe:

Mix
1 Can Ocean Spray Cranberry Sauce (Jellied or Whole)
2 tablespoons powdered sugar
½ pt. heavy cream (whipped)
½ teaspoon almond extract
Freeze in refrigerator at coldest setting. Serves 6.

How to Serve:

1. Freeze and serve in parfait or sherbet glasses. Pass Christmas cookies with it.
2. Put dessert in refrigerator tray. Over top sprinkle crumb mixture made with:
¾ cup gingersnap crumbs
1 tablespoon sugar
2 tablespoons butter, softened, not melted
Freeze. Slice and serve. Serves 6-8

Nice thing about this dessert is you can make it the day before. Keep it stored in freezer tray.

made for his wife when he became emperor in 1825. Through his granddaughter, my mother's mother, it descended eventually to me. My mother wore it at her coronation in 1922. She chose it, also, to wear on state occasions during the visit she made to this country. And so the tiara and I both entered the United States twice, and together. My mother had given it to me when I was married in 1931. I lent it to her to wear at the Jubilee of King George V of England, and she left it in her bank in London because of unsettled conditions at home. After her death I had no small trouble in claiming it, but I got it away from England just before World War II actually began. I kept it in Austria until 1943, when I smuggled it into Romania, and from there I saved it from the communists when I left in 1948. It went to Switzerland with me, and then to Argentina, where I pawned it to put money into an unfortunate business that failed. Its adventures as a single piece of jewelry were then almost over, for it became evident that I must try to sell it in order to pay our debts.

Because by this time I was suffering severely from arthritis, I received permission in May, 1950, to come to the United States for medical treatment. As I gathered all my forces, physical and financial, to make this trip, I felt desperately that I was nearing the end of my endurance. I pawned everything I had of value in order to leave my family in Buenos Aires the money to live on, and in order to redeem the tiara. I could not afford to insure something whose "breakup" value had once been appraised at $80,000, so I decided to wrap it in my nightgown and keep it with me in a small bag. Thus with $300, a ticket to Boston and a hidden tiara, I prepared to enter the United States for the second time.

It was a thirty-hour trip by air—over the Andes and finally over the Caribbean—and I had plenty of time to think. Bursitis in my left arm made me barely able to move it, and my back and feet were one continual ache from arthritis.

Six months earlier my two older children had received scholarships in preparatory schools—one in Pennsylvania and one in Massachusetts—and their letters had been showing a growing confidence and contentment. For most of their lives they had been the victims of war and its accompanying anxieties, first in their father's homeland and then in mine, and the younger children could not remember any other conditions. My husband and I had sought security and a new life for them in Switzerland and then in Argentina, but we had not found it. Could it be that somehow, in the friendly country I had visited as a girl, I might find a new home for them? What princess who is also a mother would not give up a diadem to gain a home for her children!

Anxious, weary, in pain but strangely hopeful, I finally arrived in Miami, where the long flight was interrupted. I lined up for customs inspection. When it was my turn and I answered that I had something to declare, I asked if I could unpack my bag in private. The officer was good-humored, but a little impatient with my hesitation. When I insisted, he made it clear that he thought I was being a nuisance.

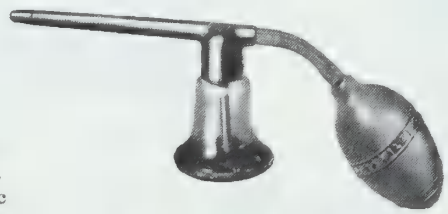
"What have you got there, anyway—a corpse?" he asked.

However, when he finally led me to an office it was obvious that he did not know quite what to do when a tiara turned up in the luggage he inspected. He touched the central sapphire a little gingerly. Since it weighed 125 carats, it was nearly the size of a man's pocket watch. Was it real? he wanted to know. When I assured him that it was, he looked still more harassed, but finally he decided that he would send it to Boston "in bond." Together we wrapped it in a newspaper and put it into a box, which he duly sealed and ticketed. It was with a qualm, I confess, that I watched it put into the luggage compartment of the plane for Boston before I myself embarked. If it should somehow be lost, I was losing everything I had, and it was now out of my hands!

Arriving in Boston, I was told that since it was Sunday, all offices were closed, and I would have to wait to claim my "package." I knew no one in Boston except the friend who, with her husband's help, had arranged for me to come to this country. Since she could not be sure of the time of my arrival, I was to let her know when I got to the airport. I found a telephone and stood looking at it stupidly, giddy from my thirty hours' flight and full of pain. I had no idea how to use a dial telephone, but I was in the United States, where people are kind. A friendly gentleman found the number for me and called my friend. While I waited for her to come and fetch me I tried to forget my anxiety by looking back across the years since I had seen her—twenty-five, to be exact.

I had been fifteen years old then, learning my way in social work, and an enthusiastic member of the Romanian Girl Reserves. Helen Jackson—dark-haired, with a gay, round face and twinkling eyes—had come to Bucarest to help start the industrial section of the Y.W.C.A. there. Her songs and fun put us all at ease, and I loved the opportunities to be with her group of girls. Helen, her job completed, left Bucarest to carry on elsewhere; I grew up; the years passed with their joys and griefs. She was now Mrs. John Beale, with hair turned gray, but kindness still unchanged.

Helen and Jack Beale opened the doors of their home to me until I found a home of my own. They drove me to Newton along the Charles River, and I found it beautiful—so green and sunny, so clean and free. Then and there I fell in love with New England.



In the joy of seeing my two older children again—so changed and grown in the months they had been away—in the need of rest and immediate medical care at the Lahey Clinic (once I had found a temporary haven, I seemed for a time almost to collapse from the long anxiety I had suffered), the diadem was temporarily pushed to the back of my mind. When I did think of it, I felt confident of its safety in this friendly country.

Ten days of rest and hospital treatment made me able to find my way to the customhouse and inquire for my "parcel." It took some time for the officials to trace it, and I felt some stabs of alarm until it was finally located in a safe in another building.

Does Your Throat Feel Ticklish?

WE'VE all suffered from one of these persistent little tickles that keep us coughing. Your doctor, of course, knows of a number of solutions which will soothe and alleviate this condition. When he prescribes one he'll probably advise you to apply it with an atomizer. That's because he knows of the scientific research which has demonstrated the superiority of atomization over gargling. Atomization reaches more of the affected area—thus often helps bring quicker relief. Your druggist carries DeVilbiss Atomizers—both to use at home, or leak-proof pocket atomizers for use at business or while traveling. The DeVilbiss Company, Toledo 1, Ohio, and Windsor, Ontario.

FORGOTTEN CHILDREN

In the wake of war, 13,000,000 abandoned, starving, wounded children trailed across Europe. Begging for enough food to stay alive, 3,000,000 haunted Italy; 250,000 roamed through France; in Greece, one child of every eight was left alone; in Korea, the numbers still grow.

War's end has brought them little. It has found them some rest in orphanages of the world, in children's villages; but often, not enough food. Many still suffer from serious nutritional deficiencies contracted during the wartime.

Remember the World's Forgotten Children for Christmas. A $10 gift to CARE will send a package of food to an orphanage or children's village in one of twenty countries in Europe or Asia. CARE packages of clothing material and food can be sent for $4; a holiday dinner of a whole canned turkey and all the trimmings for a dozen people, for $18.75. To their impoverished schools, you can send a $10 package of children's books.

Send your gift to CARE, 20 Broad Street, New York 5, N. Y., or to any local CARE office.

Evenflo at the Hospital

Mrs. Wojno is happy that she had her baby at the Peoples Hospital in Akron, Ohio. Little Tommy and she got off to the best mother-son relations over the Evenflo Nursers which that hospital uses exclusively. Their few minutes together were always pleasant since Tommy easily got all the food he wanted without gagging or gas pains.

Mrs. Wojno plans to use Evenflo at home, too. She figures if a hospital handling so many babies a week uses Evenflo, it must certainly be just right for one baby.

MURINE
FOR YOUR EYES

Everyone was very matter-of-fact about the whole thing, both then and the next day, when we all met by appointment in an office of the customhouse. Everyone was very matter-of-fact until the parcel was opened, and the officials saw what had been lying about the office for ten days—for even I, who was so familiar with it, felt always a thrill of delight at the radiance of blue-and-white fire when the tiara was suddenly brought into the light.

The faces of the men revealed their shocked amazement. They gasped. Then one smiled, relieved.

"But of course you have this insured!" he said.

"No," I told him calmly. "Why should I? It has escaped the Nazis and the communists. Naturally I did not expect to lose it here!"

They were evidently uncertain whether to laugh or to scold me; but from that moment we were friends! One of the men asked me to autograph a visitors' register he kept—"with all your titles and things!" he explained; and I was tempted to draw him a little sketch of the tiara as a souvenir. The age of the jewel was found to make it free of customs, so eventually I walked off with it under my arm—still in its somewhat battered cardboard box—and I mailed the package to a jeweler in New York. Finally, it was sold for a sum much below its value. It was both beautiful and splendid, but my children were in need. As it stood, it neither fed nor clothed nor warmed us. I could not even wear it'

So I was grateful on the day when it was gone, even though I felt a traitor to the past and all the proud heads that had worn it. I wondered if my ancestors were turning in their graves—and then I remembered that hardly any of them have graves any more. Does this sound strange to you? It is because the communist and the revolutionist fear the dead and destroy their bodies. Those graves of heroes which have been shrines for the people, those tombs of rulers which bear testimony to the proud history of a nation—all of them are violated. The remains of bodies are dug up and burned, their ashes are scattered and the ground is leveled. So it may well be with the graves of my parents, although when I was exiled in 1948 theirs had not yet been touched.

Even then, however, there had begun a violation of which this destruction of graves is but a symbol.

Before I left Romania I talked about this with Emil Bodnaras, then communist Secretary of the Cabinet. I asked him why the communists were circulating slanders which they knew to be false.

"But surely you can see why this must be," he told me calmly. "You and your class must go. The past must go. As we destroy the very ashes of the dead so that nothing remains, so we must destroy every vestige of love and respect for their memory in the hearts and minds of the people. What your mother did for the people—what you have done for them—must first be tarnished and then blotted out."

Well, the graves have been destroyed. It remains to be seen if the past can be wiped out so simply and completely. Perhaps it will be like my tiara, lost to me in one form, but still helping and protecting me in another. It had been a gift from my mother, and what it enabled me to do I consider also her gifts: to pay my debts of two years' standing; to make a first payment on a home in New England; to go back to Buenos Aires and bring the four other children to the United States; to put them in school; to take a respite in which I could regain my health and find a way of earning my livelihood.

"Il faut faire face à la vie car la vie aime les braves"—It is necessary to turn around and confront life, for life loves the brave: so my mother once wrote in a book she dedicated to a friend. Many years later, in a time of great trouble for me, I found and opened that book—and the message was as if my mother had spoken to me in that hour.

URDA HAS A SILVER DOLLAR

"He has already made a red Santa Claus in school," ma said. "With sandpaper for a sack. If there is one thing pa needs, it is a match scratcher."

I nodded, and almost let it slip about the picture with the pasted-on Star of the East, that ma was to get. And I had already seen twice, because Lars was only five and couldn't wait, the pasted-together sled of red paper, for hard candies, that would be mine.

"I'll wash up the dishes first, ma," I said, standing on one foot and praying hard inside. And the prayer came true.

"You'd better get the shopping done," ma said, "before the best things are bought out. I'll do the dishes this morning."

I stood on the front porch afterward, in button-on leggings, and tam-o'-shanter over my ears, and mitts on a string, and the coat ma had made from her last-five-years' coat. Around me, down that way and up that way, Iron Valley looked like the big bowl of lingonberried whipped cream that ma always set out to spread her big, thin, sweet Swedish pancakes with. I took a deep breath. It was cold and sharp, like a drink of water after peppermint candy, inside. I thought which way to go? Behind the house was the caves way. The caves were broken red fallings-in of the earth, in summer. But now, with the snow, they mounded over like a birthday cake before the candles.

The streetcar ran past the house—up to Jessieville, that way, down to Hurley, that. In the summer the tracks were just a warning and a racket. Sometimes you pressed pins into crossed scissors, by laying them on the rail and letting the wheels run over. Pa licked you when he caught you at that. But now, today, this morning just a frozen breath away from Christmas, the tracks were no flat ribbons laid on flat earth. Last night the plow had come and chewed its way through the drifts, and its breath had stood like crushed stars around it. And now you could walk between mountains, all the way down to Montreal River.

I CHECKED again, to make sure the dollar lay safe in the little coin purse on the top of the white-bearded last-Christmas muff that hung by a ribbon down on my middle. And then I stepped off the porch and over my leggings in the drifts, and turned leftward onto the packed glass-hard road that was the tracks.

One of the big streetcars came bumping. I stepped quickly into the first recess that had been cut into the drifted mountain specially to stand and wait in. I waved at Motorman Ohlin, who waved back from up front. And I waved at Conductor Liljegren, who waved back from behind.

I was so busy thinking, as I walked, of the mountains of licorice buttons at four for a penny that you could buy with a whole silver dollar, I forgot to turn at Lutheran Church corner. I was across Norfolk, and I was across Suffolk, and I was still walking and thinking, when I realized. Just as I was about to turn and go back then, I saw the new sign over the new store. Schuster's Bazaar.

I had heard enough about that bazaar! Pa, ma, all the people. When the store had moved in, last summer, all the way from Chicago or somewhere, everybody said it would not last. Everybody said no one would buy. Yet you'd go somewhere and there would be a new hammer, or a new set of dishes, or a new doll buggy. And ma would ask, or pa would ask, "From where?" And after a while you'd find out, Schuster's Bazaar. And quickly, right away, "I saved eighteen cents!" Or twenty-eight, or something.

I STOOD there in the middle of the glassy track, between the two high snow mountains, and made myself think about the ladies Bergman and their little store. And I touched my mitten to where my dollar was, in the muff. And I thought, Eighteen cents! I climbed through the drifts, and walked quickly into the dark beyond the Bazaar sign that screeled and waggled.

It was so full of people, pushing at me from behind and stopping me in front, at first I couldn't see anything. And then I realized there really were lights burning, bulbs dangling on twisted cords that hung from way up high in a gray-painted steel ceiling. And the walls were gray-painted too. I looked for the evergreen, the red berries, the colored-paper chrysanthemums that were always at the Bergmans', Christmas. There wasn't anything but just things laid tight on tables. I tried to smell Christmas with my nose. All I could smell was the shut-in smell of the store, and the sweat of the people pushing.

I walked and looked without touching, tried to make myself remember about the eighteen cents more my dollar could maybe buy. And the thought came, suddenly like a slap, maybe it wasn't Christmas at all? Maybe it was just any day, last summer? You couldn't tell, here at Schuster's Bazaar!

I turned and pushed blindly at the wool knees behind me, until they gave. And then I ran and ran.

I didn't miss Suffolk Street, this time. I ran the two blocks up to Vaughn. And I ran up the footstep walk in the snow, all the way up Vaughn, to the Bergmans'.

Outside the green-painted storm front, I just stood and breathed myself full. I looked at the window where the oldest old lady, Mrs. Bergman herself, sat. It was full of geraniums and myrtle, with here and there a crepe-paper flower stuck in to keep the real flowers from being lonesome. I looked at he other window, where the other Bergman ady, that everybody in Iron Valley called Anna Greta, kept her candies that were haped like little fishes.

The glass jars stood there, scrubbed so hey had little rainbows in them. And each was filled with fish candies that were brighter han the last—spun white; spun white with elts of clear scarlet; brown sugar; brown ugar belted with clear brown; clear brown ishes that tasted of anise; round little white atties that melted peppermint over your ongue; round little pink pellets that melted wintergreen over your tongue. And laced in nd out among the jars, green and rich so ou could all but smell them right through he windowpane, were the Christmas-tree ranches. I took a deep breath again. And hen I opened the two doors and went inside.

Old Lady Bergman sat at her place just nside the door, sewing a blue satin dress for he big doll with the china hands and feet rom Butler Brothers in Chicago, and the leeping-eye head with the long real curls. I ent at the knees to her and wiped my feet ood so the snow wouldn't trail dark on the lean-scrubbed rag rug.

Old Anna Greta was waiting on Charlie who had the saloon, and Pastor Gustafson who had the Methodist Church. She looked up at me and her brown eyes danced in her head like a bird's.

"Good Christmas, Urda!" Anna Greta said, across all the pretty dolls tied into their boxes.

"Good Christmas, Anna Greta . . . Charlie, Pastor Gustafson!" I said. And I bent at the knees again, the way ma said you must do when you are young, to those older and wiser than you.

"Snuff for your papa?" she said. "Oh, and tell him we have those new stereopticons of Stockholm he asked for."

I drew myself straight. "I am here shopping for Christmas," I said. "All by myself. With a whole silver dollar!"

Charlie reached and pulled the tassel on my tam-o'-shanter. "You tell your pa," he said, "that I said to keep your money under your hat, when you come to spend it. They are not all as honest as Anna Greta, here. When they learn you have two prices to pay, the merchants, they will ask you two prices. Eh, Gustafson?"

Pastor Gustafson only smiled under his brown mustache, and the smile slid and hid in his fine brown beard. "You ask a pastor about business, Charlie?"

Someone else, of all the people waiting, had taken Anna Greta, now. She called at me over her shoulder.

"You go and look, Urda," she said. "And then you find what you want, you come and tell me."

I STOOD there over the sawbuck counter with all the open doll boxes, the steel-strip doll beds with flowery mattresses and canopies, the coiled-wire doll buggies, the sewing baskets with a million spools of thread, each another color. I stopped in front of the brown wood tool chest with the real hammer and saw and nails, and I thought of Lars. I slid farther along the rough wood to where the fine boxes were, each with a lumpy plaster hairbrush and comb and mirror, clasped against draped yellow and red and purple satin. I thought of ma's plain wood brush that she kept hidden. I stopped in front of the pipes—straight pipes and writhing pipes and pipes with cords and tassels, each on its half shell of red velvet. You just snapped the velvet-lined lid tight, and—there was Christmas for pa! And over here, inked silver, with heart and key, waiting to have its tissued paper for your wrist. And over there, a real iron cookstove like ma's own, with four lids that lifted, and a real chimney for the smoke!

"Well, Urda?" Anna Greta called from the other end of the counter. "Do you see anything yet?"

I was just opening my mouth to say, "Not yet!" And my mouth just hung there. For there it was. My hand reached for it, and there it stayed. I couldn't touch the thing. I could only stand and stare at it. And as I stood there, the Christmas smells of Anna Greta's store crowded around me: raw wood from the packing boxes, the green growth all around, the smell of the fire that crisped and crackled and talked to itself in the tall black stove on its four skinny legs, the bakings and the cookings in the kitchen beyond. Over my head, on string after string, dangled the Christmas-tree candies that Anna Greta had made out of bright tissue, crimped at the ends, gold paper strippings, lithographed Christ pictures, squares or fingers of candy. Aware I was of all of them. But all I saw was . . . the thing.

IT stood among its fellows, the small chest of drawers. Around it, studded as thickly with small shells, were handkerchief boxes and ring boxes and pincushions and picture frames. There was a flash of red velvet here, scarlet satin there. There was even a companion small bookcase with two real windowpane doors. But all I saw was the chest of drawers. It was of green-plaid paper. Each drawer had two brass draw rings. A small square mirror finished the top. And up the sides and down the sides and around the corners, shells, shells, shells. I knew I had never seen anything so beautiful in all my life.

"Ah, I see you have found what you want, Urda?" Anna Greta said.

The tool chest for Lars, the lumpy dresser set for ma, the elaborate pipe in its split case for pa—even the iron stove for myself—they vanished as if they had never been.

"How much?" It was all the breath I had.

Anna Greta leaned and picked up the chest from under my pointing finger. My heart stopped with fear as her hand took it—took it lightly, as if it were just anything. She stood the chest on its head.

"Well, Urda, it seems to say ——" she said.

I saw the $1.75 too! I turned my back and pretended that the bellyband that held one of the dolls needed tying.

"But this is a mistake!" Anna Greta scolded. "That careless girl—I told her that this chest is to be exactly one dollar! And here she goes and marks it one-seventy-five! Tcha!"

"You mean, a dollar!" I almost upset the chest out of her hand, I turned back so quickly.

"And, oh, my but it will make a good Christmas present!" Anna Greta said.

I marched up the street with it, later, done into tissue paper and wrapping paper and finally into a great square Narrköping's snuffbox. And the snow was a summer's cloud under my feet. And the ice-spittled wind was April breathing over rained-on lilacs.

At our gate I ran into someone I hadn't seen running down the street. I slid my precious box out of the way and glared at the Shelley boy across the top of it.

"Hey, Swede kid!" he shouted. "Gonna eat up all that Norrkopping snuss before Christmas, hey?"

"Howard Shelley!" I yelled back at him. "With the buckskin belly!" And then I ran.

In the front hall Lars came flying at me. "Look at the big Anna Greta box! What I got for Christmas in it? Huh, Urda? Show me!"

Before I could get my wind, ma came. "Hush, Lars! You'll wake your pa. And it's not time to wake pa for work for another hour. My, Urda!" She looked at my great armful of box. "Oh, my, so many things you must have bought! I hope you remembered to get something for yourself too?"

And suddenly I stood there and looked at ma. At Lars. And the breathless treasure I carried was only a cardboard carton for snuff. And, little as the tissue-paper-wrapped jewel it held was, it dragged at my arms with the weight of all sin.

"Hurry up, go hide it away, Urda," ma said. "Better lock it in your closet. Lars doesn't always remember that Christmas is something to wait for. There is coffee. Fresh. And the cardamon braid is fresh out of the oven."

I went slowly up the stairs, and locked my room, and stood on a chair to push the box from Bergmans' far into a corner of a closet shelf.

Ma said had I had too many Anna Greta peppermint fish? When had she ever known me, she said, to eat only one slice of white Christmas coffee braid?

You could hide a box. That I learned, those next days, you could hide a box far out of sight on a closet shelf. But to hide it from remembering in your mind —— You went back to it and back to it, like your tongue into the hole where your tooth ached.

And the littlest thing, those last days before Christmas! Pa, stopping where I was helping ma with the dishes, rubbing my braids over my head. "The young lady of the house, who buys her own presents for Christmas. What do you think of her, Anna?" pa would say. And what ma said back, I couldn't even hear. It was as if my head were tied up in that Narrköping's box, locked there upstairs, with the little, little, little thing inside it that was all my dollar, my great big silver dollar, had bought for all four of us!

Mostly, though, it was Lars. What you buy me, Urda? What you buy me, Urda? While I was seeing that he scrubbed his ears in the morning. While I was seeing that his feet were clean before he stuck them into his sleepers at night, the way ma said. What you got for me, Urda?

"I'll tell you what ma got you." He would even get up and stick his head through the door between his room and mine, after ma and pa had said good night. "I'll tell you what ma got that's blue, and silk, and ties. If you tell me? Huh, Urda?"

And I sat there and looked at him across the brass bedstead. And I thought, All right, tell him! What would you say, Master Lars Larson, if you knew about that cardboard chest of drawers, not so big as pa's hand, hardly, all lumpy with shells sticking out all over?

That was the night I crept up and took down the snuffbox. Behind locked doors, quietly so ma shouldn't hear and come knocking, I untied and unwrapped. And sat looking. I could feel the goose bumps in the cold, as I looked.

"That thing!" I said. "That little stinkin' thing!"

I COULD see the tool chest. I could see the pipe in its red velvet bed. I could see ma's dresser, with the lumpy white plaster brush and comb and mirror, cradled in yellow shining satin. I looked again at the little, little handful of paper and make-believe, studded with shells.

"I'll bring it back!" I said. And suddenly I felt good all over. Good, as if ma had lifted off a wet raincoat from me. So good, I stood up in my hurry to repack. And then just stood there, looking at the thing—on the floor, now, where my sudden movement had tossed it.

I knelt and, not breathing, picked it up. I was saying little prayers, Dear God, Dear God! I sat back on my cold heels, so relieved that the thing still was whole that I felt a little sick. And then I saw. It was not whole. I picked up a whole corner of shells from where they lay on the bedside rug. I could only sit there and look at them, the chest with its bald corner showing through, the clump of shells that said no to my selling Anna Greta back my first lesson in bargaining.

I couldn't sleep very much that night, either. I kept dreaming. The little shelled-up chest seemed to be standing all alone on a big open place. And then it would begin to rain, not soft singing rain but great big packages of rain done up in brown paper and red string. And it would rain and rain and rain. And when I looked, there was no green-plaid paper chest there at all. Only a mountain of brown-wrapped bundles. There were white bits of paper. I could read them, even all that dreaming way. To Pa. To Ma. To Lars. To—Urda! That last was the worst. It woke me up.

Ma took Lars down to the stores next day. Lars had that secret look, you-tell-me-I'll-tell-you. I couldn't look back. Ma said to keep an eye on the dopp kettle, while she was gone. I said yes, I would. Lars yelled, "Don't eat up all the sausage!" Ma said, turning around in the door, "I almost wish you would, Urda! You haven't eaten as much as the new kitty, hardly! Goodness, if you're laid up with bronchitis or something, for Christmas!"

I WAS stirring the great pot of cooking meats and sausage, lightly with the fork the way ma had showed me. Pa came down, yawning from his sleep. It was almost time for him to go on shift. It would be his last until after Christmas. Pa always took off, though both he and ma said he really couldn't afford to lose the time. But—Christmas, they said.

"Ah," pa said. "Just in time for a stolen bit of dunking!"

I nodded and gave him a slice of ma's white bread. He broke off a little corner, dipped lightly into the bubbling broth, blew and tasted slowly.

"But for goodness' sake, girl, not you? Here!"

I shook my head.

"Already too full?" pa said.

I let him believe it.

"Mamma and Lars back soon? I'm a hungry man!" pa said.

"Everything's ready for supper when they come," I said.

"Christmas!" pa said. "Rice pudding, all milk and cinnamon and sugar. Lutfisk in all that cream sauce with the chopped eggs. And—doppa in the kettle!"

"Yes, pa," I said. I gave him another slice of bread.

But pa just sat down. He took my hand, not the bread. He sat and looked at me, and his eyes were no taller than mine.

"Things get bigger and bigger, like a balloon blowing up, when you keep them inside you," pa said. "Open your mouth and talk. And out they come. And you'll be surprised, they're really not big at all!"

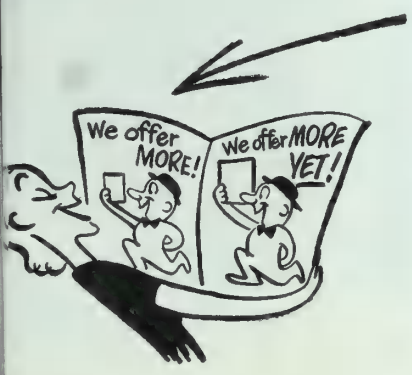
I stood and tried not to look. I felt as if one breath and all the buttons on my red dress would fly all over the kitchen. I looked back up at pa.

"That silver dollar," I said. "All I went and spent it for was just a cardboard box with shells on it."

Pa looked down at my hand that still had the bread in it. He looked back at me. "It must have been a very pretty box. With shells on it."

I could feel the bubble of my crime shrinking inside me and giving me room for breath. "But it's just a silly old cardboard box with a piece of glass on top of it, pa! Just a silly old paper box with rings on the drawers!"

"Drawers?" pa said. "How many drawers would you say, Urda?"



"Four, pa!" I said. I had counted them often enough, first like a miser and then like the chafing sackclothed sinner I was.

"Four," pa said.

"For you, pa," I said. "For ma. And for Lars. And for you, pa. And for the house. We always give the house! Just that silly old box with shells on it, for you and ma and Lars and the house!"

Pa wasn't even listening. "Four drawers." I watched him take out his big gold watch. It hung by a braided chain, goldish like ma's hair because it was ma's hair. A bangle hung on the chain. When you opened it, there was a tiny picture inside, of ma with me when I was a baby. "I've always wanted a place to keep things like this. A nice safe place. A drawer, say. With rings on it."

Ma came then, with Lars lusting in ahead. And I stood and tried not to look at all the packages pa was helping her lock into the hall closet. And then we ate. And somehow I got things down so ma shouldn't notice how hard.

It was Christmas Eve next day. And even I was too busy to think much about anything besides helping ma, and standing still for the last fitting of the dress I should wear to church Christmas Night for piece-speaking, and trying to pin that butterfly piece itself to my mind so it shouldn't fly away and leave me standing there in front of everybody with my mouth open. It was a Swedish piece, and I kept stumbling over one word—korset. It meant The Cross. It sounded like what ma had pa help lace herself into, when she dressed up special.

Pa was home all day, Christmas Eve. I heard when he and Lars brought in the Christmas tree. I needn't have heard. I could smell. It took the whole forest I had never seen, but had heard pa talk so much of, into the corner of the parlor with it. It stood there and held up the ceiling with a long green-whiskered finger that after tonight would be wearing a star.

It was bedtime early. The Jul Gubbe would have to come and help pa and ma fix the tree, and Lars must be sleeping or he would go again. Ma was bending over the kitchen table, with all the papers and string and cards and things saved from last year.

"Come and choose, so you can wrap," she said. "Lars? Urda?"

I watched Lars grab himself a handful of the gaudiest, go running. Without thinking, I laid my hand on a dark green oatmeal paper ma had pressed the wrinkles out of.

"Only one, Urda?" ma said. "You'll be needing four or five, won't you?"

I reached blindly. And turned and went upstairs. And then I locked the door against peeping Lars. And sat down on the bed, and just sat there.

After a while I had to go and get the Narrköping's snuffbox. I took out the thing in the tissue paper and just held it. I heard ma come up and scold Lars and shut his door on him, and go downstairs. As she passed my room she called:

"Everything all right, Urda?"

"Yes, ma," I said.

My hands were cold and my feet were cold and I could feel my teeth talking to themselves. I had a sudden impulse to take the shelled silly box in my lap and throw it at the far wall. I picked it up, even. The tissue paper slid away. My eyes went to the corner with the gaping place where the shells had come off.

There was no naked corner. The shells were fixed again. I leaned and sniffed. Glue, like the glue that had fastened on my doll's hair when it had come off last year.

"Pa," I said. I touched the corner. It was secure. "Pa!" And then I was hearing him again. Just as if he stood there: "Four drawers. Four drawers!"

NOT thinking, I pulled at one of the brass rings. The top drawer slid forward. It was deep and secure. It was lined with a sharp pink paper. I thought of pa's bangle for his watch chain. A safe place, pa had said. A safe place!

And then I was up, flying around the room. Still in its box I found the little silver pencil I had got from my cousin in Chicago. Lars had begged and begged for it. There was a silk handkerchief with pictures painted all over it. I had saved and saved it for best, but no best had come that was important enough. It would look pretty, pinned to ma's blouse shoulder. I slid off its narrow black velvet ribbon the tiny locket grandma in Sweden had sent me. That would go just right on pa's watch chain. It had a twist of pa's own baby hair in it.

I sat down then at the desk pa had made me, and printed cards. And then I tied. And I didn't know how cold I was, even. I wound and wound the tissue paper, carefully so no single shell should come loose. And then I wrapped around the green oatmeal paper. And then the brown wrapping paper, tied with red string.

THE house was so still when I opened the door and tiptoed downstairs. But even so, even though I had waited to hear everyone come upstairs, I held my breath going down. I felt my way, tiptoe in my knitted slippers, until I found the parlor door. I pushed it open, and then closed it behind me. And then I was kneeling in front of the tree.

Back at the door again, I stopped and stood listening, holding my heart in my throat with both hands. But no, that was nobody coming downstairs. There was only me, awake in all this Christmas house. And that great dark shadow of a tree, wearing its scarlet cranberries and its popcorn snow and its spangles and its star on top.

I stood with my cold hand on the knob and looked around the room. The treasure mountain of brown-wrapped bundles. The rainbows frozen to the windowpanes. The great round mirror, that usually hung below the cuckoo clock, that lay now like a still lake under the tree for the Christmas goat and the Christmas pig to repeat themselves in. The pearl-mothered wash over everything.

I could hear the cuckoo striking. I counted. Twelve.

While it was still not day, we would be up and on our way to Julotta, all of us. And tomorrow would be a long wild day, from breakfast and the presents, when we came back from church, to Christmas supper and church tomorrow night. There would be the long-dance around the Christmas tree, ma and pa and Lars and me and whoever else came in. There would be singing around ma at the tramping organ. There would be the going from door to door through the snow, with presents, yelling Good Christmas until you had no wind in your lungs.

I yawned. I must go back to bed. I was sleepy. It felt so good.

Just as I turned to close the door behind me I saw the tall chest ma had brought to Michigan with her, from home in Sweden. Its rubbed walnut top was bare. But even as I idly glanced at it, I could see as if it stood there now what must surely stand there tomorrow. The tissue would be off. And the green paper. And the brown. The big card ma would have hung from the mirror. I shut my eyes and read it as if it showed there now. To my house. And everybody in it. And tied to each little drawer ring—To Lars. To Ma. To Pa! Treasure of shell-studded green-checkered cardboard, I thought. That I could have doubted for even a minute!

I saw it, still in its brown paper under the tree, as I closed the door. The fattest, reddest, shiningest tree bell dipped and bobbed over it, like a divining rod over a cache of inestimable treasure. THE END

Young Daughter

By Marion Lineaweaver

Rose-round arms
Flung up and over
The spread fan
Of her coal-black hair;
Her lawn gown
Hung up with the cover
Of lavendered linen,
Leaving bare
The soft, wild,
Animal child.

Leaning nearer,
Touching her hand,
Breathing her skin
Like leaves, like sand,
I see that her dusky eyes
Are open, smiling a little—
Not at me—
Looking at something
I never see.

I saw it once,
As a girl of eleven,
Worldly-wise
When the world was heaven.

Here's a trick that keeps custard pie crusts crisp

—another pie-baking hint from MARIE GIFFORD, Armour's famous home economist

Bake your favorite custard in a separate pie tin—one that's the same size as the baked pie shell. Cool until lukewarm. Run a knife around the custard edge—then slip the baked custard into the crust and serve. This way the undercrust stays as crisp as can be!

Your pie crusts will be deliciously flaky and tender, too—when you use Armour Star Lard. It's America's perfect pie lard—the lard of pie-baking champions! Armour Star Lard comes in the handy self-measuring cartons with Marie Gifford's famous 5-minute pie crust recipe printed on them. Try this easy, can't-fail recipe next time you bake. It's exactly the right recipe for this new-type lard that needs no refrigeration. You mix all ingredients at room temperature!

Got a pie-baking question? Just write to Marie Gifford, Dept. 469, Box 2053, Armour and Company, Chicago 9, Illinois. She will help you with any pie-baking problem you may have. Write to Marie Gifford, too, for an interesting free booklet of her favorite baking recipes.

APPLES ON A STICK

1 c. Gold Label Brer Rabbit Molasses
1 c. sugar	¼ c. water
1 tsp. cider vinegar	2 tbsps. butter
⅓ tsp. salt	6-7 medium apples

Combine molasses, sugar, vinegar, salt and water. Cook slowly, stirring constantly, to 270° F. (or when a small quantity dropped into cold water forms a hard but not brittle thread.) Remove from heat and place over hot water. Add butter. Insert wooden skewers in stem end of apples and dip into syrup covering entire surface. Remove from syrup, twirling to give an even coating. Cool on greased baking sheet.

MOLASSES MINT BROWNIES

½ c. butter or margarine	¾ c. sifted all-purpose flour
¼ c. Brer Rabbit Molasses*	¼ tsp. salt
1 c. sugar	½ c. chopped walnut meats
2 eggs	½ tsp. vanilla
16 chocolate peppermint patties, broken

Melt butter in saucepan over low heat. Remove from heat; cool. Add molasses and sugar; mix well. Add eggs, one at a time, beating after each addition. Sift together flour and salt, add along with nut meats and vanilla; mix well. Line 8" x 8" pan with waxed paper; grease. Pour ½ mixture into pan. Sprinkle with mints; cover with remaining batter. Bake at 350° F. (mod. oven) 40 minutes or until toothpick inserted in center comes out dry. Cool 5 min. Remove from pan; cut into 16 squares.

By LOUELLA G. SHOUER

IF there's ever a time when you can't have too many cookies, it's Christmas. Crisp or soft, sugared or filled, spiced to suit every taste, here's a new crop of cooky and candy recipes for you to make. Christmas will be merrier, too, if the children have a hand in the doings. Some of these would make delightful gifts.

PRUNE BONBONS—fruit-and-nut centers cloaked with crisp meringue—are a confection you shouldn't miss. They'll disappear first when you pass the cooky plate!

PRUNE BONBONS

Rinse 40 large prunes with cold water. Place in colander over boiling water. Cover and steam 10 minutes. Cool. Remove pits. Put prunes and 12 maraschino cherries and ½ cup walnuts through the food chopper, using the medium blade. Mix well and shape into 24 small round balls. Beat 2 egg whites with ⅛ teaspoon salt until stiff. Beat in ½ cup sugar, 1 tablespoon at a time. Blend in ½ teaspoon vanilla. Dip the fruit balls in meringue and roll around to coat completely, using two forks. This is easier than it sounds. Lift balls onto greased cooky sheets. Garnish with little topknot pieces of candied cherry for a Christmasy look. Bake in a very slow oven, 275° F., 40 minutes. Carefully remove from cooky sheet. Cool on rack. Makes 2 dozen.

A COOKY dough that will keep a week or so in the refrigerator—months in the freezer, to be baked whenever you have time or as needed—is wonderful to have on hand for the holidays. Here are two refrigerator cookies that are sure to be favorites—one zesty with lemon, the other laced with dates.

DATE PIN WHEELS

Cut ½ pound pitted dates into pieces. Cook in a saucepan with ⅓ cup water, ¼ cup sugar and 1 teaspoon lemon juice for 5 minutes. Then cool it. Let it get really cold. For the cooky dough, cream together ½ cup butter or margarine, 1½ cups brown sugar and 1 egg, beaten. Add 2 cups flour sifted with ¼ teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon baking soda. Chill dough thoroughly. Roll out to ¼" thickness in a rectangle about 9"x20" on floured board. Spread date filling on the dough almost but quite to the edge—if you spread it clo the edge the filling will ooze out when roll it. Roll up like a jelly roll. The will be about 1¼" to 1½" in diam Cut roll in half. Wrap in wax paper chill overnight. This can be frozen, too later use. When ready to bake, slice dough ¼" thick. Bake on greased c sheets in moderate oven, 350° F., abo minutes. Secret of success: Thorough ing of the dough makes it easier to r

CHRISTMAS is a time of sharing, and readers share their family cooky re with us. The delicious honey-pecan we tasted at Mrs. Hulce's last summe saved the recipe for Christmas. The sugar rings are a variation of an old recipe, Norwegian loops, that a New J reader says are always on her Chri list. How about yours?

HONEY-PECAN BALLS

Cream 1 cup butter or margarine wi cup honey. Add ½ teaspoon salt, teaspoon grated orange rind, 2 teas vanilla, 3 cups flour and 1 cup chopped pecans. Mix very thoro

For the Christmas tea party—crisp sugar rings and honey-pecan balls. Make plenty.

Sweet treats for Christmas giving—coconut sweetmeats and tutti-frutti squares.
Wrap some in foil for mailing to the boys.

Merry Christmas

Snip off small pieces of dough and form into small balls with the palms of your hands. Place on lightly greased cooky sheets and bake in a slow oven, 300° F., 20 minutes, until a light tan. Roll in confectioners' sugar while still warm. Makes 7 dozen.

CRISP SUGAR RINGS

Cream 1 cup butter or margarine and ½ cup sugar together. Put yolks of 2 hard-cooked eggs through a sieve and add to the creamed mixture. Now blend in 2 raw egg yolks and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Gradually add 3½ cups flour and ⅛ teaspoon salt. The trick is to use as little flour as possible—or just enough to make the dough easy to handle. Knead gently a few minutes. Chill until firm. Take about a quarter of the dough at a time. Roll out to nearly ¼" thickness. Cut out in small rings, 1½", using two small cutters, or cut them in squares. Place on greased cooky sheets. Brush with unbeaten egg white and sprinkle with colored sugar. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., only until very lightly browned—12–15 minutes. Makes 4 dozen or more.

THERE'S always room for some cooky bars or squares in the box you send to the boys in camp. Because of their fruitcakelike nature, tutti-frutti squares don't dry out in shipping as quickly as a brownie, for instance. Most boys like coconut, and the coconut sweetmeats travel well. Both should be wrapped in foil.

COCONUT SWEETMEATS

Sift 1¼ cups cake flour with ½ teaspoon salt. Cream ⅓ cup butter or margarine with ¼ cup brown sugar, firmly packed. Add the sifted flour and salt a little at a time. Mix well. Press into greased rectangular pan, 13"x9"x2". Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., 15 minutes, or until delicately browned. While this layer bakes, beat 2 eggs until thick and light. Add ¾ cup brown sugar and beat until thick and foamy. Add 2 tablespoons cake flour, ½ teaspoon baking powder, ¼ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon vanilla, 1½ cups moist shredded coconut and 1 cup coarsely chopped nuts. Spread over baked layer. Garnish top with nuts and halves of candied cherries. Return to moderate oven, 350° F., 20 minutes, or until done. Cool. Cut into bars or squares. Makes 3½ dozen bars or squares.

TUTTI-FRUTTI SQUARES

Beat 2 eggs until light. Add 1 cup superfine fruit sugar and beat until spongy. Add 3 tablespoons melted butter or margarine, 1 cup pitted dates cut into pieces, ¼ cup diced candied lemon peel, ½ cup diced candied orange peel, ½ cup diced candied pineapple and 1 cup chopped filberts. Last, stir in ¾ cup flour, sifted with 1½ teaspoons baking powder and ½ teaspoon salt. Spread dough ½" thick in a well-greased shallow pan and bake in a slow oven, 300° F., about 40 minutes. When cool, cut into squares and roll in confectioners' sugar. Makes 2 dozen.

IT'S easy to go to a store and buy candy, but it's a great deal more fun to make it yourself. Better hie to the kitchen and get things going. Call on dad's strong arm when it comes time to beat. Let the children lick the pan as a reward for chopping the nuts. Here is a recipe for twice-cooked divinity, chocolate dipped, and one for rich, smooth, molasses-flavored praline creams.

stirring to 235° F. by candy thermometer or until the sirup spins a long thread from the tip of a spoon. This doesn't mean just a drizzle of sirup—but when sirup is right that thread will really look like a crystal thread and it will fly in the air if there's a draft nearby. Turn off heat immediately. Beat 2 egg whites until stiff but still in soft glossy peaks. Add half the sirup gradually to the egg whites while you beat continuously with a wire whisk in the other hand, unless you have an electric mixer-beater. Let this stand while you cook the rest of the sirup to the stage when a little of the sirup forms a hard ball in cold water—250° F. by the thermometer. Pour the longer-cooked sirup over the whites gradually and, just as before, keep up the beating. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and beat until it begins to "fudge" and lose its shine. Candied cherries and/or nuts may be added toward the end of the beating. We used ½ cup candied cherries and ½ cup chopped nuts.

Drop from a teaspoon onto wax paper. Cool. Melt one 8-ounce package semisweet chocolate over hot water. Dip each piece of divinity into the chocolate to the halfway mark.

MOLASSES-PRALINE CREAMS

Mix together 2 cups sugar, ½ cup molasses, 1 cup cream and a pinch of salt in a heavy saucepan that has a tight-fitting lid. Cook, covered, over low heat, gradually increasing heat until mixture comes to a full boil. Cook without stirring till it forms a soft ball in cold water, or to a temperature of 235–238° F. if you use a thermometer. Set candy pan in a pan of cold water. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and 1 tablespoon butter or margarine. Don't stir it in or your candy will be sugary and not creamy as it should be. When candy is cool enough to touch with your finger, it is ready to beat. Beat until thick and add 2 cups shelled pecans or walnuts. When it begins to lose its shine and the color lightens, it is ready to be poured into a well-greased pan. When set, cut into squares.

Fruit-and-nut confections are just as popular at Christmastime as homemade candy, and here are three—all quick and easy to do. We made the caramel pecans for a bazaar last year and they were sold out within an hour. If you're stuffing dates for a gift box, stuff some apricots, too, for color as well as good eating.

STUFFED APRICOTS

Cook dried apricots in water to cover just long enough to soften slightly—about 10 minutes. Drain and cool. Wrap each apricot half around a pecan half. Roll in sugar. Dry on a rack.

CARAMEL PECANS

Caramelize ¾ cup sugar in a skillet over low heat. When all the sugar has liquefied, turn off heat and stir in one 3½-ounce can pecan halves. Coat pecans quickly with the sirup. Drop in clusters on greased cooky sheets. Store in tightly covered container as soon as they are cool.

HONEY-COATED FILBERTS

Toast 1 cup filberts in a moderate oven, 350° F., 10–15 minutes. Rub as much of the skin off the nuts as you can. It crisps in the toasting. Heat ½ cup sugar in a skillet slowly until it melts and begins to caramelize. Add 1 tablespoon honey. Blend in. Stir in the whole filberts. Drop in clusters on greased cooky sheets. When cool, store in tightly covered container. THE END

Ask any Woman

By MARCELENE COX

FALLING in love in middle age is like coming into a movie when the show is half over.

A little touch of jealousy may be a good thing for a woman who has begun to let her figure go.

Old colored woman to bride: "Housework's one thing there's no catchin' up with; you go to bed at night, everythin' done, but while you's sleepin' sheets are wrinklin', dust is settlin', and stomachs are gettin' empty."

Small boy contemplating a visit to his grandmother's: "I'm so glad this morning I'm me."

New bride in air-conditioned, heated apartment: "All George has to do is get up in time to take out the butter so it'll be soft for our toast."

To be convinced that "love is blind," one has only to station oneself at a central meeting place and observe who is met by whom.

Modern man is full of pill power.

A man spends the premarital days telling a woman she ought to tread on velvet, sleep on satin, never know fatigue . . . and the rest of his life expecting her to "cook like mother," serve his meals on time, cope with the furnace, raise his children competently, manage his hours, finances and the in-laws with the ease of an expert!

Young mother's three d's: diet, diapers, don't.

There's one time when our family can safely prophesy the weather: the day we start out to buy a Christmas tree always proves to be the coldest in the year.

In these days of high meat prices man does not live by bread alone—but almost.

Whenever Aunt Mary saw a woman straining her eyes to tell the right and wrong side of linens, she would say, "If you can't decide without squinting, what difference does it make!"

Mother at night: as overworked as the "down" elevator button on the top floor.

"My wife has an old beau," says our school maintenance man, straightening a row of small tables, "who has sent her a birthday present every year for twenty years. But I don't mind! It helps me to remember when her birthday is."

A middle-aged couple, dining out—not saying a word to each other—is one of life's saddest spectacles.

Good fruit has occasionally resulted from a seed sown recklessly by the wind, but surer-quality fruit is obtained by exact planting, tending, pruning.

One woman's children hear only of their failures; a wiser mother emphasizes success: "You've done such a fine piece of work on this—I'm sure you can improve on that."

By the time a woman has all the equipment needed to "save her steps," her steps have all grown up.

Betty Crocker
CHERRY CORDIAL CHIFFON CAKE

MAKE ONLY WITH SOFTASILK

Preheat oven (see pan sizes and corresponding temperatures below). SIFT an ample amount of SOFTASILK CAKE FLOUR onto a square of paper. Chop nuts very fine; slice and chop well drained maraschino cherries very fine (see quantities below).

STEP 1 . . . Measure (level measurements thruout) and SIFT together into mixing bowl:

- 2¼ cups sifted SOFTASILK Cake Flour (spoon lightly into cup, don't pack)
- 1½ cups sugar
- 3 tsp. baking powder
- 1 tsp. salt

Make a well and add in order:

- ½ cup cooking (salad) oil, such as Wesson
- 5 unbeaten egg yolks (medium-sized)
- ¼ cup maraschino cherry juice
- ½ cup cold water
- 1 tsp. vanilla

Beat until smooth with spoon or beat with electric mixer on medium speed for 1 minute.

STEP 2 . . . Measure into large mixing bowl:

- 1 cup egg whites (7 or 8)
- ½ tsp. cream of tartar

Beat until whites form very stiff peaks by hand or with electric mixer on high speed for 3 to 5 minutes. DO NOT UNDERBEAT. Egg whites are stiff enough when a rubber scraper drawn through them leaves a clean path.

STEP 3 . . . Pour egg yolk mixture gradually over beaten egg whites—gently folding with rubber scraper just until blended. DO NOT STIR.

Mix together:

- ½ cup very thinly sliced and finely chopped well drained maraschino cherries
- ½ cup very finely chopped nuts

Sprinkle over top of batter gently folding in with a few strokes. Pour into ungreased pan immediately.

Bake: Tube pan, 10 x 4-in.—325° (slow moderate oven)—65 to 70 minutes; oblong pan, 13 x 9½ x 2-in.—350° (mod. oven)—45 to 50 minutes . . . or until top springs back when lightly touched.

Immediately turn pan upside down, placing tube part over neck of funnel or bottle, or resting edges of oblong pan on 2 other pans. Let hang, free of table, until cold. Loosen from sides and tube with spatula. Turn pan over and hit edge sharply on table to loosen. Frost with White Mountain Icing.

CAUTION: Cherries must be very well drained and very finely chopped or they will sink to the bottom.

WHITE MOUNTAIN ICING

Stir until well blended in a small saucepan ½ cup sugar, ¼ cup white corn syrup, 2 tbsp. water. Boil rapidly to 242° (mixture spins a 6 to 8-in. thread or a few drops form a firm ball when dropped into cold water). When mixture begins to boil, start beating ¼ cup egg whites (2 small). Beat until stiff enough to hold a peak. Pour hot syrup slowly in a thin steady stream into beaten egg whites, beating constantly with electric or rotary beater until mixture stands in very stiff peaks. Blend in 1 tsp. vanilla.

Telephone Folks Will Play Santa for Thousands of Kids

As you read this, telephone operators all over the country are dressing thousands of dolls for distribution to children's homes and hospitals at Christmas.

Down in Texas, other telephone people are packing gay gift boxes for remote farm families. December 24, the pilot who patrols Long Distance cables across the lonely plains will drop them by parachute and wave a friendly "Merry Christmas to All" by waggling the wings of his plane.

Throughout the Bell System, thousands of other telephone men and women are collecting food, candy, toys and dollars for those less fortunate than themselves.

It's a long-time telephone tradition — and a rather natural one. The spirit of service and the spirit of Christmas are pretty close together. And telephone folks try to be good citizens all year 'round.

DIARY OF DOMESTICITY

Open house on Christmas Eve is my favorite time. The children are home, Christmas carols fill the air, the buffet supper is on the trestle table, the ham spicy and well glazed, the salad crisp in the big wooden bowl. And as Ed Shenton says, plenty of comfortable chairs and sofas all filled with dogs while the guests lean against the walls!

Since the advent of my friend the dishwasher, I don't mind how many guests there are. No more do I look forward to late hours standing over the sink after the party is over. By the time the coffee is served, the hum of the dishwasher sounds and the main dishes are washing themselves. And a wonderful by-product is that every inch in the kitchen is not cluttered with dirty dishes, the counters are already neat.

Books are as nice for Christmas as anything can be. A good book is a permanent gift, a friend for all time. A serious, thoughtful book like A King's Story is more than a memoir; it gives the picture of a whole age. And for the bedside table, nothing could be better than Ted Key's Many Happy Returns. No hour could be so dark but that the delightful people who move and live in Ted's cartoons can lighten it. They are the kind to revisit, too; every time you open the book, you enjoy it all over again. One of the most charming of the new novels is Barbara Webster's A Horse of Her Own. This is a gift for very special friends.

The best mirror is an old friend. —SPANISH PROVERB.

Most of us feel the days of extravagant giving are over for a while. But when you give a good book to someone, you are giving a rich present for a small sum.

How wonderful it is that we can still celebrate the birth of Christ as we always have in America. The candles shine openly from every window in our valley, the village tree bears its brave and shining fruit, and every door wears pine and bittersweet and holly and a bright ribbon. We renew our faith as the stars shine in the winter sky.

I remember the story about my friend Lois Holloway's grandmother, who stopped every day in her church on the way home. Her son said, "But mother, what do you find to pray about every day?"

"Oh, I don't pray," she said. "I just sit there and look at God and God looks at me."

We all need to look at God, and at Christmastime I like to go out of the house in the new-fallen snow and find my way to the quiet frosty pond, and feel the nearness of God. The dark beautiful woods, the pure immensity of sky, the faint sound of water flowing under the ice, the incredibly clear air—all these are a testament to the beauty that has been granted us on this old earth.

The Christmas gifts most priceless are the courage we are given to face whatever may lie in the years ahead, the faith in the ultimate good in the world, and the love which passes understanding

Back in the house the candles are dripping colored wax on pine and maple. The popcorn bowls are almost empty, just a few little black toasty bits left. Apples and nuts and raisins scent the air. Steve and Olive start down the road to the little red house by the water-cress brook.

The house guests disappear to do a last-minute wrap, the children have run out of cards and Cicely is making new ones with cardboard and star stickers. The boys are concocting milk punch in the kitchen, for the smell of scorched pans is quite definite. Dorothy is fixing a bedtime snack for all pleasant cats, and the two most loved Irish setters in New England are offering to help her. Five cockers have already gone to bed on my bed—Sister, Jonquil, Melody, Tiki, Linda. Snow and Hildegarde are by the fire, heads pillowed on paws. Blazer and Jerry are working over the dog stockings, since a bone in the mouth is worth two hanging from the mantel.

Jill has moved the turkey again, this time to the oven with the timer set so it will begin roasting at 275° F. long before we are up. The mince pies are on top of the refrigerator, and maybe Daphne doesn't care for mince anyway, we hope.

The tree, in the front living room, shines with silver and blue. When I go in to put out the lights, I know there is one more cocker in the house, for Honey is there, lifting her dark amber eyes and wagging her whisk of golden tail.

How comforting to think that although some people might believe that those who go into that other room are gone indeed, Honey and I know better. Death has no power to deprive us of those we love, indeed it has not. So when I put on one last carol, it is Honey's carol; she was born loving Christmas music. And her favorite, and mine, sounds just as it always has on Christmas Eve:

"God rest you merry, gentlemen!"

RELIGION IN AMERICAN LIFE

the Scriptures, and the frame of reference in which they were originally made?

Can some of the greatest music of Western civilization be divorced from its inspiration: the great passion music of Bach; the Missa Solemnis of Beethoven; the Requiem of Verdi; the Elijah of Mendelssohn? Must one be a Roman Catholic to recognize that the Mass is perhaps the only real immortal work of art that Western civilization has ever produced?

Are some of the greatest pictures of the world nothing more than decorative designs in form and color, to be taken apart from the spiritual atmosphere and faith which inspired them?

And is the function of education merely to train children for a job, and for the "correct social attitudes" (whatever these may be at the time), or is it also to cultivate their minds and their souls, to refine their senses, and to increase their sensibility to the things that are good, noble and worthy to be emulated?

It is all very well to say these things should be "left to church and home." The church cannot function on the peripheries of a civilization. Even communist states are willing it should drag out its existence divorced from the rest of life. The home has changed; in great cities it is reduced, for most families, into a functional apparatus for eating and sleeping in, not commodious enough to be a center of the child's life, which is increasingly spent in school, social activities radiating from the school, and in clubs and playgrounds.

The basis of all education must be training in character. It is character that determines the fate of societies—as the old Greeks knew when they said "Character is Destiny," as the poet Housman knew, when he wrote, in A Shropshire Lad, apropos of Victoria's jubilee, "Get ye the men your fathers got, and God will save the Queen!"

A supposedly God-fearing people (ourselves) who take the lead in founding the United Nations, whose Presidents take the oath of office on the Bible, but who were afraid to open the San Francisco Conference with a prayer lest it offend the Russians, deserve the United Nations they have got.

A God-fearing people, sure of its moorings, has nothing whatever to fear from communism. A nation spiritually adrift can be blown on the rocks by any high wind.
